ence of opinion between the present Minister of Defence, and, so far as I am able to follow the matter, a difference of opinion between myself and the ex-Minister of Defence. It appears to the Government that the provisions inserted are less urgent than some other provisions which might be made with advantage at the present time. To make the matter quite clear, let me first refer to other items which appear to the Government quite as urgent as they did to the late Minister of Defence. There is item 4, which is £58,000 for field artillery. This is to provide the artillery with proper guns, harness, waggons, and 500 rounds of ammunition for each of eighty-four guns. We have, at present, thirty-six 15-pounders, and twelve in process of conversion in England, and we shall have thirty-six 18-pounders, twenty-four of which were ordered last year, and twelve of which are to be ordered this year. There still remain another twelve to be ordered next year. Last year, there was £67,000 voted for the field artillery.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was the amount spent; we voted £72,000.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Next year, we shall need £48,686, making a total of £175,000 to effectively equip the field artillery. This appears to be a very urgent matter. Item 8, which is £2,000 for equipment of field engineers, also appears to be urgent. Honorable members will see that this latter is in addition to the £2,000 voted last year; and, I may add, that £2,216 more will be required next year, making a total of £6,216 for the field engineers. Then machine guns are another necessity, and £10,260 is proposed for four Maxims, and the proportion of ammunition required with them. That is in addition to £9,072 voted last year, and to £24,508 which will be required next year, or in subsequent years. A total of £43,840 will be required before we can complete our equipment in regard to machine guns. Then comes item 10, which covers the provision for the two 7½ guns and one 6-inch gun for Fremantle, and the supply of ammunition. Items 12, 13, and 14 are small, providing for six gyroscopes, service shell for 8-inch and 6-inch guns, and submarine mining equipment, and 12-pounder equipment, all for Queensland.

Mr. McCAY.—I think the last is a doubtful item, too.

Mr. DEAKIN.—These are small items, but, so far as my colleague has gone, he sees no reason to think that there are more urgent matters to which they need give place.

Mr. MCCAY.—I am inclined to think that item 14 is not necessary.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I shall have the benefit of the honorable and learned member's opinion. The position we find ourselves in is one of some difficulty. With our predecessor's Estimates, so far as the items alluded to are concerned, which mean £95,000 out of the total, we agree in every respect. As to the items to which I first called attention, and which the ex-Minister of Defence proposed—except in regard to the Cerberus guns—with a view to completing Sir Edward Hutton's scheme for the field and garrison forces, it seems to the Government doubtful whether the full amounts, or anything like the full amounts, ought to be devoted to those purposes this year. It appears to us that there are other matters more urgent, and, first, I may mention the provision of cordite, especially for the big guns.

Mr. CROUCH.—Is it proposed to make the cordite locally?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not only is the cordite manufactured abroad, but I believe the whole charge for big guns comes out made up ready for use—a completely manufactured article. It would be unnecessary, and, perhaps, unwise to go into details, even if I had them; but I think the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and those acquainted with the circumstances, will admit that we have an insufficiency of cordite at the present time.

Mr. MCCAY.—I presume the Prime Minister is speaking of fixed defences?

Mr. DEAKIN.—When I alluded to the cordite, I meant, by the colloquial reference to big guns, fixed armaments.

Mr. CROUCH.—Is it proposed to locally manufacture cordite?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We require to import the made-up cordite, because we are not yet manufacturing it here.

Mr. CROUCH.—Cordite can be manufactured here, but the Government will not pay the price for it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We shall no doubt be able to manufacture cordite; indeed, we must of necessity undertake its manufacture, but I am now only dealing with the expenditure for this year. The supply of cordite at present is insufficient; and if we are to be able to utilize our fixed armaments and most modern guns in harbor defence, it is, in the opinion of my colleague, the Minister of Defence, absolutely necessary to have a considerably larger supply. If an emergency arose, the necessary cordite could neither be manufactured here, nor hurriedly supplied.

Mr. KELLY.—How long does the Minister think it will be before we shall have sufficient ammunition to allow of practice with the quick-firing guns we have?

Mr. DEAKIN.—So far as I am definitely instructed on these matters, it will not be long. But I prefer not to discuss details, for reasons which the honorable member will understand. I think it is necessary that there should be practice, and quite admit that practice under service conditions is impossible, except with cordite. Practice with black powder is good in its way, but it is not practice under service conditions, and it is not the practice which is required. I am thinking not only of practice, but of possibilities—let us hope, extremely remote—of the immediate future, which to my honorable colleague appeared to strongly suggest the wisdom of supplying ourselves with cordite for our fixed guns, before we concern ourselves with the supply of accoutrements or saddlery. The late Minister of Defence, in the course of his remarks, made an appeal to the Committee not to be captivated by a proposal to increase the number of rifles. I can assure the honorable and learned gentleman that his remarks caused me to again look into the question more closely, giving that due weight which I think ought to attach to his opinions. Yet, having looked into the question, and admitting, as the honorable and learned gentleman said, that we have one rifle for every effective man of our forces intended to use a rifle, and also nearly 5,000 rifles more, nevertheless, when I find that the recommendation of the Imperial Defence Committee at home is that the supply of rifles should be at least 50 per cent. above the full requirements of its own effective force—

Mr. CROUCH.—They are trying to work off some of their rejected rifles on to us.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We are not obtaining any rejected rifles at present.

Mr. CROUCH.—The short rifles are rejected.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They have not been rejected. They have been adversely criticised, but they are still being manufactured and served out, and, so far as my own limited knowledge of the subject goes, the question of superiority is still a matter of grave debate in England between recognised authorities who take different views.

Mr. McCAY.—The official view is so far in favour of the new short magazine rifle.

Mr. CROUCH.—The manufacture of them has been almost stopped, and the issue of them has been almost completely stopped.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is a most important matter, which must not, of course, be overlooked; but it does not affect the principle laid down by the Imperial Defence Committee, and to which our attention has been particularly directed. Remote as we are from the old world, and incapable of manufacturing these weapons at present, it is desirable that we should take some steps towards increasing the number of magazine rifles of the best type within the Commonwealth in case of emergency. These are the two great items to which our attention is specially directed. We are not yet in a position to say definitely, for reasons I am about to give, exactly how much it will be necessary to divert from the numerous items I have mentioned, but my honorable and learned friend, the late Minister of Defence, is aware that cordite is very expensive, that rifles are also expensive; and it is therefore very easy to swallow up two-thirds of the sums he proposed to devote to the various objects mentioned which appear to us to be less urgent than necessary provision for cordite and the increase in the number of rifles. The reason why I do not come down with any definite proposal in this regard is because my honorable colleague and the members of the Government generally, hold that no scheme for the year ought to be proposed in regard to defence generally, and particularly in regard to the supply of defence stores, which is not part of a scheme laid down for a number of years. The former practice of annual dealings was put aside, when we commenced to deal with Major-General Hutton's recommendation for the expenditure of £575,000 upon a scheme in which we looked a certain number of years ahead, and made certain definite provision. It seemed to us that, in considering the question of defence, what is demanded of us is that we shall not simply propose something for one year, but that we shall propose whatever may be necessary for this year as part of a scheme stretching over a number of years. I am aware that my honorable and learned friend laid down the same principle in his speech, though, perhaps, in other words. Like the honorable and learned gentleman, we foresee that this will mean a very large expenditure in the gross—an expenditure which he estimated at something like £800,000—in order to make it complete. We desire that none of this money shall be thrown away, but that we shall, so far as we are able in the time at our disposal, provide from the very start for a consistent plan of supplying our various deficiencies. These may be in connexion with our land forces—to refer in my colloquial way to the ordinary military forces—or in connexion with our garrison forces, fortifications, or other harbor defences, all of which need improving, as my honorable and learned friend agreed. We desire that to whatever purpose expenditure is to be devoted it shall be on a settled plan. My honorable and learned friend started with a similar idea when he made provision for accoutrements, saddlery, camp equipment, tools, and supplies, as matters of most urgent importance. The point on which we differ from the honorable and learned gentleman is that, so far as our present information takes us, we consider an adequate supply of cordite ammunition for our fixed guns, and provision for more rifles, matters of much more urgent importance. We also desire to do something further on the excellent lines pursued by the honorable and learned gentleman for the encouragement of rifle shooting. This will depend very largely on the amount of money which, on inquiry, it is found can be spared. We are also inclined to afford some better opportunities for the practice of rifle shooting, in addition to the provision made by the late Minister of Defence.

Mr. McCAY.—There is additional provision for the purpose provided on these Estimates, the increase being from £3,700 up to £6,000.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not positive as to the extra amount, but think that we can take a further step, though the increase may not amount to much, in view of contingencies.

Mr. McCAY. — Not out of the vote for warlike stores, surely?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It would not be out of the vote for warlike stores, but from what could be spared from the vote for warlike stores.

Mr. McCAY.—That is the same thing. Instead of paying for warlike stores, the Government propose to give the members of rifle clubs an opportunity to travel.

Mr. DEAKIN.—To travel, in so far as that is necessary to afford them better opportunities for rifle practice, and to attend rifle competitions. The amounts to be devoted to these purposes will be very trifling in comparison with the amount which will be swallowed up in making what we consider adequate provision for a supply of cordite and for extra rifles.

Mr. FULLER.—What about rifle ranges? They have not been very liberally provided for, so far.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have been looking into all these matters, and in these respects we have been improving year by year, so far as our funds have permitted. These are some of the items down for consideration: To cheapen ammunition to riflemen, to give them a little extra travelling, better rifle ranges, and better opportunities for practice in rifle shooting. I admit that all these matters were under the consideration of the late Minister of Defence.

Mr. CROUCH.—Does this not disclose a very serious departure? Is it a question of a difference of opinion between the Minister of Defence and the ex-Minister, or has the Council of Defence changed its opinion between June and September?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is largely, no doubt, due to Ministerial initiative, but these questions are under consideration by the Council of Defence now, and, I presume, were considered by them previously.

Mr. CROUCH.—Why have they changed their opinion so completely, in a few months?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I did not say that they had changed their opinion.

Mr. McCAY.—Perhaps the honorable and learned gentleman will say whether expert opinion is behind the Minister in these suggestions?

Mr. DEAKIN.—There is expert opinion behind the Minister, but I am not yet prepared to say that the Council of Defence has finally decided anything. I am aware that the Minister has been in consultation practically with all the expert officers of his Department in endeavouring to arrive at a wise conclusion.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Council of Defence was going to give us continuity of policy.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I hope it will. We desire to adopt these Estimates, which, as honorable members know, were framed for us, so far as we can; there is no wish to make alterations for the sake of altering. But we take the view that the items I have mentioned do not represent the most urgently needed expenditure on warlike stores this year. When we have completed a full inquiry into the whole matter we will propose substitutions.

Mr. McCAY.—Shall we have an opportunity to discuss the substituted proposals?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, after the Minister has consulted his expert advisers, and the Cabinet has considered the scheme as a whole. In the meantime we ask the Committee to agree to these Estimates, because we hope that our substituted proposals will not increase the expenditure, although they may alter the mode of its appropriation. I feel that this explanation is imperfect, but the Minister himself sits in the Senate, while for the last fortnight I have been deprived of the assistance of the honorable member for Richmond, who has represented him in this Chamber, and has given the subject his undivided attention. I have, however, tried to acquaint honorable members with what is in the mind of the Government at this stage of their Defence policy.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—The announcement of the Prime Minister, that specific proposals in substitution for these Estimates will be submitted to the Committee for consideration at a later date naturally makes one feel bound—and, indeed, willing—to allow the proposed vote to pass, on the understanding that an opportunity will be afforded for the discussion of the new proposals when they have crystallized from their at present apparently nebulous condition, and have been formulated by the Government. The honorable and learned gentleman stated that, in his opinion, the proposals of the Government should be part of a permanent scheme, not subject to alteration year after year. In that view I entirely concur, and, as he is probably aware, there are minutes in the Defence Department in which that is pointed out very clearly.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I was not aware, though it was pointed out very clearly in the honorable and learned member's speech.

Mr. McCAY.—It is pointed out in the first minute laid before the Council of Defence. The other day I asked the Government to recognise the seriousness of the position, by breaking through what, I hope will be the Commonwealth practice of abstaining from borrowing, by advancing to ourselves, so to speak, the money necessary to put our defences into a proper position, and I again press that view upon their consideration. The matter is too serious for us to say, "We will spend so much this year, so much next year, and so much the year afterwards." We cannot afford to spend out of revenue all that is required, nor can we justly deprive the States of any substantially greater amount than we deprive them of now. But I would remind the Committee, quoting the substance of words which I heard not many weeks ago, that if trouble did arise, and an enemy came to our shores, he would not make any allowance for the fact that we had not been able to provide out of our annual revenue the funds necessary to defend ourselves properly, but would probably be so discourteous as to take advantage of the fact. I have no great hope of the Government being able to borrow money for this purpose, even on short-dated Treasury bills. The Prime Minister shakes his head. I do not know if he means that to be a confirmation of my opinion.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes.

Mr. McCAY.—I feared so. When the honorable member for Bland said that we had better carry out this work with money provided out of revenue, I feared that the Prime Minister would play Polonius to his Hamlet.

Mr. CROUCH.—That is ungenerous.

Mr. McCAY.—Surely one is entitled to criticise the political situation in terms as mild as that. I do not think that the Prime Minister considers himself personally affronted by my remark.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I consider the honorable and learned member mistaken.

Mr. McCAY.—So Polonius would have said had he been accused of too ready an acquiescence in Hamlet's views about the shape of the cloud. As the next best alternative—though I do not think it anything like what the necessities of the situation demand, because nothing will satisfy them but the course I have urged—I suggest that the Government should follow a precedent set in Victoria some years ago, when a scheme was perfected for the partial equipment and partial development of the Victorian Defences. I am sorry that the term "Special warlike stores" has been discarded in these Estimates for the term "Special defence material." There must be a peculiarly Quaker-like feeling abroad.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The alteration was not made by me.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not make it. Perhaps the honorable and learned member did.

Mr. McCAY.—I have the same bellicose heading in my copy, and last year the term employed was "Special warlike stores." However, the term is immaterial, so long as we make proper provision. Each year, from the 30th June, the obtaining of these supplies is entirely suspended for some months. If the Government are prepared, as they should be, to give honorable members full opportunity to consider a complete scheme some little time before the end of the session, I urge them to embody it in the schedule to a Bill which will contain clauses limiting the amount to be spent each year. In that way, if the Bill is passed, we shall have a special appropriation for a series of years, and the Department may go on without a break developing the specific scheme of which Parliament has approved.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Has that not been done already?

Mr. McCAY.—No. The money is voted every year, though we now know enough of the subject to be able to provide under a special Bill for funds to carry out the scheme for a series of years.

Mr. FULLER.—What does the honorable and learned member think the appropriation should be?

Mr. McCAY.—We require an expenditure of £800,000; but, if no loan is to be raised, Parliament must decide how much shall be spent each year.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—How much does the honorable and learned member think should be spent?

Mr. McCAY.—The more the better; but our expenditure is limited by the requirements of the States. I do not wish to repeat what I have already said on this subject, but I ask the Government to bring down their proposals, so that honorable members may deal with them, not in the form of a motion, but in the shape of a schedule to a Bill, so that, good, bad, or indifferent, Parliament may lay down a scheme which will be followed for a number of years. If that is done, the Department will be able to proceed to carry out the scheme, whoever may be the Minister in charge, without having months of harassing anxiety each year as to what amount will be voted, and how it should be expended.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Major-General Sir Edward Hutton's scheme was practically approved of by Parliament.

Mr. McCAY.—The interjection of the Treasurer brings me to another point. Parliament practically approved of Major-General Hutton's scheme, and I suppose that is why the present Government are proposing to depart from it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not because of that, but we are acting in spite of it.

Mr. McCAY.—All history proves that a small force properly equipped will always beat a large force insufficiently equipped. The Prime Minister mentions that the Government propose to increase the supply of cordite ammunition for the heavy artillery in connexion with our fixed defences, which is not at present up to the recognised Imperial standard, and this, of course, will entail the expenditure of more than a few hundred pounds. This very question was considered by Major-General Hutton, who is undoubtedly the ablest soldier we have had in Australia for a number of years. With a knowledge of all the circumstances, he did not recommend more than appears in his scheme, except, if I am correctly informed, in one particular regard. Major-General Hutton's scheme provided for an expenditure of £13,000 upon artillery ammunition in connexion with our fixed defences, but I am informed that by a clerical error the figures, £31,000, became altered to £13,000, and appeared in the report in that form. I admit that we require more ammunition for our big guns, but I contend that what we have would probably prove sufficient for the requirements of any emergency that is likely to arise during the next few years.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is a view that has not been presented to us. It has been represented that our supplies are not sufficient even for immediate requirements.

Mr. McCAY.—I arrived at the conclusion I have indicated after carefully going into the figures. I do not propose to mention any figures, because I do not consider that they should be allowed to enter into a discussion on matters of this kind. I admit, however, that the ammunition question weighed heavily upon my mind, and, of course, I did not come to any conclusion on these matters without consulting all the officers whose expert opinions were worth having. I have no very great quarrel with the Government on that point, although I say that in my personal opinion they are making a mistake. In connexion with item 6, "Miscellaneous—tools, and other materials," I may say that I would far sooner have 30,000 rifles, and a proper supply of trenching and other tools than 40,000 rifles without proper supplies of tools. Tools may be supplied locally at a pinch, although not perhaps to the fullest extent that might be desired.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is the point; the tools can be supplied locally.

Mr. McCAY.—What I wish to point out is, that as far as a peace establishment is concerned, we have not even a complete equipment for our forces. We have not a complete equipment for the men who are actually enrolled, and the Prime Minister indicates apparently that the supply of saddles which are necessary to equip merely the present light horse, is to be delayed in order that extra supplies of cordite, and an additional 5,000 magazine rifles, may be purchased.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I would rather have 10,000 rifles than 5,000.

Mr. McCAY.—The rifles may be fairly estimated to cost £5 each; therefore 5,000 rifles will cost £25,000, or, if the order be increased to 10,000 rifles, the outlay will be £50,000. I should be very glad to see an additional 10,000 magazine rifles in Australia, but I ask what particular danger will be met by increasing our supply of rifles to that extent, as contrasted with the danger that would be guarded against by the expenditure of money in other directions? The first question we have to ask ourselves in determining a defence policy for Australia, and thereby determining what forces we require to raise and equip, is, "What is the danger that we are likely to have to face?" In other words, what are the probable, and what are the possible risks to which we are exposed? I say unhesitatingly that the least risk we incur is that of an invasion of Australia in force—the risk against which the piling up of modern rifles is intended to guard.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—We do not want to pile up the rifles, but to place them in the hands of the people.

Mr. McCAY.—The Postmaster-General is quarrelling over a matter of terms. I would ask of what use would the additional rifles be if they were placed in the hands of the people unless there was an enemy to shoot at? What danger would be met by the acquisition of 10,000 additional rifles as compared with the danger that would be guarded against by the equipment of the present force? If we obtained this additional supply of rifles we should have 45,000 magazine rifles, and would possess a force of only 10,000 men properly equipped, and another 35,000 insufficiently equipped. I do not know of any probable danger to which we are likely to be exposed that would require us to place 45,000 riflemen in the field.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—We can get saddles made in this country, whereas we cannot manufacture our own rifles.

Mr. McCAY.—We cannot get saddles made in Australia in a day. If the Minister is content to wait until the enemy is at our gates he is prepared to run counter to the lessons taught by the history of every war that has taken place. Every lesson to be derived teaches us that the army that is ill equipped is the one which in a short contest loses, and in a long contest suffers enormous losses before it can secure its proper share of success.

Mr. CONROY.—That is not borne out by the history of the French revolution. It was the well-equipped troops of the allies that were defeated by the ill-equipped French troops.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not derive that lesson from the history of the wars of Napoleon. I do not say that any amount of equipment will enable badly led forces to defeat well-led troops. I am assuming equality of leadership. All history tells us that lack of equipment is the cause of disaster. One has only to look at the history of the Civil War in the United States to learn that more than once the southern States, would have won if their armies had been as well equipped as they were courageous and well led. If before we provide against the obvious danger of attack by comparatively small numbers, which our field force of 30,000 would easily be able to meet, we provide against a more remote contingency, I contend that we are reversing the proper order of things. I am not going to quarrel with the details to which the Prime Minister has referred, because I shall have an opportunity of doing that at a later stage. Much as I desire to see Australia a nation of riflemen, I claim that the proposal to purchase more rifles before completing the equipment of a definitely determined force, is consonant with no scheme of defence against probable dangers. It means preparing for the remoter contingency before completing our preparations for the nearer contingency. It is on that ground of principle alone that I quarrel with the particular item mentioned by the Prime Minister. I am quite aware that there is a vague feeling abroad that the more rifles we possess the better off we shall be.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Is that only a "vague feeling"?

Mr. McCAY.—It is vague, because it has not been crystallized into asking—"What are we going to do with the rifles?" Only the other day a man in Western Australia remarked to me—"We shall never be safe in Australia until we have 500,000 rifles here. There are a million able-bodied men in the Commonwealth; let us have a rifle for every second man who is fit for service."

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Does the honorable and learned member contend that we have sufficient rifles?

Mr. McCAY.—I do not.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Would it not be better to have a shortage of saddles than a shortage of rifles?

Mr. McCAY.—There is no shortage of rifles for any probable contingency. Is it likely that within the next twelve months Australia will be invaded in force? If war were to break out at any moment, is it not far more likely that we should suffer from flying invasions than from an attack in force?

Mr. CROUCH.—Why should not we provide against both contingencies?

Mr. McCAY.—Because we have not the money.

Mr. CROUCH.—Are we not here to insure that Australia shall have a proper system of defence?

Mr. McCAY.—I admit that we require all these things. It is a question of which we should undertake first. I contend that by increasing the supply of our rifles before completing the equipment of the existing forces—by increasing the supplies of our second line of defence before completing the equipment of our first line is unsound policy.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Even when the supplies for our second line of defence consist of rifles, whereas the equipment of the existing forces merely involves the supply of bandoliers and belts.

Mr. McCAY.—I may tell the Prime Minister that bandoliers and belts form a very important part of the equipment of the service. I protest against the theory that the defence of the Commonwealth can be intrusted to men who have merely to be given rifles and a pocketful of cartridges, and told to go off and fight. There is a good deal more than that required. A certain amount of training is absolutely necessary. If there is to be a choice between the purchase of additional rifles and the training of our leaders—and by “leaders” I do not necessarily mean officers at the top of the tree, because a corporal is just as much a leader as a general, though to a lesser extent—I should prefer to see more money spent in sending an increased number of officers abroad for instruction. In imagining that by merely increasing the supply of rifles, we shall make Australia safe, we are committing the gravest of errors. The danger which will require Australia to use 60,000 rifles in the field is so remote as to be unworthy of consideration compared with the danger that might require us to place 15,000 or 20,000 men in the field. When the pinch comes, it will come quickly. If war were to break out at any point on our coast, we should require to send our troops there immediately. We should not be afforded an opportunity to complete the manufacture of the requisite number of saddles. We could not send a wire to the enemy, saying, “As soon as our saddles are finished, we will come and fight you.”

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have the saddles now.

Mr. McCAY.—As a matter of fact, the saddles at present in use are either the property of the mounted men themselves, or are nearly worn out. Moreover, in a citizen army we have to satisfy not only the public whom it is designed to protect, but the reasonable feelings of the members of the forces themselves, because they are practically volunteers.

Mr. CHANTER.—Are they not willing to supply their own saddles? They have done so in the past.

Mr. McCAY.—They do so now. This vote for the purchase of saddles appeared upon last year's Estimates. The reason the saddles were not supplied was not because the work was postponed to enable something more pressing to be carried out, but because difficulties arose in connexion with the steel arches required in their manufacture, and because I decided that, as far as possible, everything connected with them should be made in Australia. As a matter of fact, I found that we could obtain the saddles as cheaply in Australia as we could in England, whilst, at the same time, we could exercise more supervision over them, so far as quality was concerned.

Troubles arose, however, in obtaining samples, and this caused delay. I consider that a proper saddle upon a horse is almost as important as is a proper rifle in the hands of a trooper. A mounted man is no better than his horse, and the rider of an animal with a sore back is of no use. I only offer these few observations with a view to impressing upon the Government the nature of the danger that we have to meet. I ask them to allocate their expenditure accordingly, instead of merely satisfying an uncrystallized idea as to what the defence of Australia would best consist of. An army of magnificent riflemen possessed of plenty of ammunition, would be of no use, unless it was well led, well equipped, well trained, and well supplied, and unless it was able to move about freely, knowing that supplies would come forward from its base.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—The honorable and learned member for Corinella, who is more fitted than is any layman in the Commonwealth to speak upon defence matters, has laid down a most excellent principle, which should guide us in all our deliberations—the principle that, in considering what things we want, we should have regard to what we want them for. The honorable and learned member seemed to think that that principle would naturally lead us to suppose that a “field force” was a more pressing requirement for the Commonwealth than is the proper completion—I say “completion” advisedly—of the coastal defence of Australia. While agreeing with the honorable and learned member that what we want above all things in connexion with our defences is continuity of policy, I disagree with him when he says that a field force is better designed to meet the more probable dangers of Australia than is the coastal defence—the defence of our shipping and centres of population.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not think I said that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But it was implied in the argument.

Mr. KELLY.—I do not think the honorable and learned member did make that statement; but, whether intentionally or not, he implied it.

Mr. McCAY.—I said that a field force of fixed dimensions properly equipped would meet our probable dangers better than would the indefinite extension of the numbers of rifles we possess.

Mr. KELLY.—I absolutely agree with the honorable and learned member in that respect; but is it not infinitely more probable that our coastal defence, rather than the field force of which he has been speaking, will be called upon to meet the first attack that the Commonwealth has to fear?

Mr. McCAY.—I do not think so. I believe that the back door is just as likely to be attacked as is the front door.

Mr. KELLY.—I do not agree with the honorable and learned member, and I shall put very briefly the reasons why I cannot agree with him. All our schemes for the defence of Australia are based on the proposition that England is able to maintain command of the seas in time of war. Now, we know that it has been laid down by the Imperial authorities on coastal defence that while we have command of the seas, every section of the Empire must be prepared first of all for a raid, or even for an attempt at forcing a passage on the part of isolated ships or small squadrons of the enemy; and we further know that Great Britain has made preparations to prevent such raids by securing an immense preponderating strength in cruisers. I mention this point only to show the honorable and learned member for Corinella that any ships that came here to attempt a raid, or to act in any of the other offensive capacities open to them, while Great Britain still maintained control of the seas, would be able to stop in one place for only a very short time. They would not be in a position to engage in that form of attack to which the honorable and learned member has referred—a “deliberate attack” on any point of the coast line of Australia—and it would be only in cases of “deliberate attack” that definite landing parties would act in conjunction with the fire from those ships. It is laid down in Artillery Training for 1904—a work that is quoted throughout the Empire as the “authority” on coastal defence—that there are three, or, including “bombardment”—a most unlikely form—four attacks to which we might be subjected. Taken in the order of their danger, the first is a “raid,” the second the “forcing of a passage,” and these two attacks are both possible, and, we are told, probable while the command of the sea is still maintained by us—while the third attack is that which the honorable and learned member for Corinella apprehends, a “deliberate attack” on cities by combined land and naval forces. It is laid down in the same authority that this form of attack is impossible while England commands control of the seas.

Mr. CROUCH.—Is not that work issued in England in respect only to English conditions?

Mr. KELLY.—It is issued for the Empire, and is recognised, not only in England, but throughout the Empire.

Mr. McCAY.—It is a garrison artilleryman's view of garrison artillery duty.

Mr. KELLY.—It expresses the view held, not only by garrison artillerymen, but by the naval authorities, that no definite expedition—and when I use the word “expedition” I mean expedition of land forces—could be sent oversea against us by a foreign power until command of the seas had been taken away from the country now possessing it. That shows that, for the form of attack to which we are most exposed, neither a field force nor a conscript force is the protection we most urgently require. In the extremely able speech on defence which the honorable and learned member for Corinella delivered a week or two ago, he mentioned, as one of the uses to which our field force might be put, that it might be directed against some of the foreign possessions in the neighbourhood of the Commonwealth. I can only say that a field force that had built up for itself a very fine field artillery—if it ever attained the efficiency necessary to properly manœuvre and use that artillery—would find its field artillery of little use against those possessions; for the type of mountain guns or mule guns required for use against those possessions is not provided for in the equipment of our field force. But I do say that a field force is infinitely more useful than is a vast inconglomerate of untrained immobile men, armed with rifles, but lacking in any of the equipment which the honorable member has properly described as absolutely necessary. I wish to point only to this one fact in this regard: that we have in Australia an average of only one and a quarter inhabitants per square mile. A third of that population is centred within a very small area. So that, if we take one-third of the 775,000 men available for military service, that third, which is living in the different centres of population, could be used as a very valuable adjunct to any defence force in those particular centres; but, as a means of repelling invasion, it would be useless. It would be immobile, and, on the face of it, quite without the commissariat and other trains absolutely requisite to make a force easily concentratable at threatened points. It could not be moved; nor could the very sparse population; and, therefore, soldiery, outside our centres of population, could not be concentrated on any point attacked by the enemy. If an enemy came here for any purpose after our command of the seas had been lost, it would be to occupy territory that we had not occupied; and I hold that it would be far better for the Commonwealth to devote the money it is now proposing to spend on mere rifles to repel invasion, if not to the real defences of the country, then to a scheme to increase the population. A large population is, after all, the very best weapon we could have against occupation of territory.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—“Mere rifles” are very handy.

Mr. KELLY.—They would not be very handy in Western Australia, when their bearers were wanted in Queensland; or in Sydney, when they were required in Northern Territory, and when we had not the means to convey them from one point to the other! The expenditure proposed to be incurred will be useless to any except the big centres of population, which will probably never be invaded until other parts of the Commonwealth have been occupied. All I wish to put this evening is first the urgency to properly equip, as the honorable and learned member for Corinella said, one section of our Defence Forces at a time; and the section which, I suggest, requires most urgently to be equipped, since it is the first that would come into requisition, is the coastal defences. I have already shown that, so far as the defence of Sydney goes, we have not sufficient cordite ammunition to permit of practice with the quick-firing guns. I do not agree with the honorable and learned member that our coastal defences are in a reasonable position to repel attack when we have not taken the common precautions necessary to make ourselves efficient in the use of these guns. We have not the men required to man the guns with one gun's crew per gun. Furthermore, we require very urgently one particular type of gun there—the 12-pounder gun—as an anti-torpedo boat armament. These are the defences which I would urge on the consideration of the Prime Minister as necessary to be completed before all others are dealt with.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I am glad to notice the spirit which has come over the Committee since last session. It shows that certain history which has been made during the past year has brought honorable members into a rather serious mood concerning defence matters. It was with a good deal of pleasure I noticed that the Prime Minister, even before he attained office, in an interview which he gave to the Melbourne Herald, struck a note which showed that he was leading public opinion in this direction. I am sorry that I have not been able to get all the details of his scheme, and I was not able to follow them as quickly as did the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who had an already complete knowledge of the scheme, and from whom I certainly expected to get a longer explanation than he gave.

Mr. McCAY.—I spoke very fully on the subject a week or two ago.

Mr. CROUCH.—Yes; and I read the speech of the honorable and learned member with very great interest. I did expect to hear from him a fuller explanation of the details of the scheme. However, we are promised that it will be submitted by means of a definite motion by-and-by. I should like an opportunity to compare his scheme, which certainly seems to have a logical, consistent base, with the scheme which has been put forward by the Prime Minister on behalf of the Minister of Defence. There is not the slightest doubt that a comparison reveals that a serious departure has taken place. We were promised, although I never expected it, a continuity of policy from the Council of Defence and the Military and Naval Boards, but we find that two-thirds of the proposals in respect of special warlike material have been swept away, and new proposals have been introduced.

Mr. KELLY.—The only way to get continuity of policy would be to insure Parliament knowing what the Council of Defence proposes from time to time.

Mr. CROUCH.—That should be done at a private sitting. In my opinion, these questions should not be discussed in public. I do not wish the representatives of the press to be excluded, because I believe that, if it came to the last stage of patriotism, they would suppress information which should not go to the public and the enemy.

I think that the ideas propounded by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, in his recent speech, were largely brought into his mind by reading the details of Major-General Hutton's scheme, and by constant consultation with his principal advisers and the Council of Defence. It contained certain detailed military proposals which I think military nations would not have allowed to go forth. Even the slight details we get give certain information, which it is inadvisable to publish, but which certainly could be discussed at a private meeting of the Committee with the Council of Defence.

Mr. KELLY.—Every one seems to know all about defence except this House.

Mr. CROUCH.—Since the honorable member read up a book called The Garrison Artillery Manual 1904 he seems to possess absolute knowledge on every phase of the defence question.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable and learned member has not even got the name of the book right.

Mr. CROUCH.—I acknowledge with deep regret that I do not know the title of the wonderful little book which has imbued the honorable member with complete knowledge, not only on defence matters, but on every other subject which comes before the Chamber. As to the amount to be spent by both Minister and ex-Minister on new field artillery, although it is quite wise that we should equip our field artillery, still I hold that we want a permanent field artillery corps.

Mr. MCCAY.—The honorable and learned member is prejudiced on the subject of the militia field artillery.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am. From the nature of their training and their special work, I do not think the field artillery should be entirely confined to militia. It is specialized work for specially trained men. One of the disastrous provisions which I think the honorable and learned member introduced into the Defence Act was that in which, except for purposes of instruction, the field artillery had to be entirely militia or volunteer. There is no doubt but that far too great importance has previously been attached to field artillery. Take the highly-trained permanent artillery that was engaged on each side in the late Russo-Japanese war. Of the casualties which were reported to the Head-quarters Staff, 85 per cent. were due to rifles, 7 per cent. to bayonets, and only 8 per cent. to field guns and shrapnel, although field guns are the most expensive part of a fighting force.

Mr. KELLY.—It does not follow that there would not have been greater casualties amongst the infantry if they had not had the protection of field guns.

Mr. CROUCH.—Certainly not. But in Australia we should certainly have the nucleus of an effective field artillery force. On the cordite question I am completely with the Prime Minister, but is the Committee aware that for the sum of £6,000 we could get our cordite made in Australia? It has been brought under the notice of every Minister of Defence since the portfolio was held by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, that the Deer Park Explosives Company, which makes dynamite, gelignite, and all the explosives kindred to cordite, is prepared for the sum of £6,000 to erect the necessary plant and buildings to manufacture such cordite as we might require at a cost of 3s., whereas the Department is paying 2s. At the time of the South African war Waltham Abbey—the place in England from which we get our cordite—immediately raised the price from 2s. to 2s. 6d., so that the increase, instead of being 50 per cent., would be only 20 per cent. It is absolutely necessary that our cordite should be made here.

Mr. DEAKIN.—These questions are all part of a larger scheme.

Mr. CROUCH. — But what does it mean? The Prime Minister gets twelve months' ammunition for his garrison guns and rifles, but the whole of that would be fired away in two days in time of war. What is to happen to the country then? The Prime Minister admits that he would like to carry out both schemes, if he could. But he does not think that we want equipment completed before everything else. Why should we not adopt both schemes? It might mean that the expenditure on defence would be increased from £178,000 to £278,000, and of course the cry would be raised that we were not returning to the States as much as they expected. But the whole position in regard to the importance of defence is altered by the fact that we have near to us an energetic, able, well equipped and armed nation that is going to play a large part in the Pacific. In view of that fact, we shall not do our duty to the people of this country unless we make sure that we are properly defended. I would support any Minister of Defence who proposed to increase and improve our defences until they reached a stage of absolute efficiency. If we do not do these things, our enemy in time of war will not desist from attacking us because we are not ready; and, if that should happen, the very people whom we are trying to save—the States Treasurers—would be the first to blame us for leaving the country undefended. Let me remind honorable members of some lines in Tennyson's ballad of "The Fleet." On an occasion when Sir Graham Berry, then Agent-General for Victoria in London, was speaking at a banquet, he referred to the scandalous way in which the defences of the Empire were neglected. Tennyson, who heard his remarks, went home and wrote the ballad from which I shall quote. He emphasized the danger of neglecting the defences of the country, and said that if they were neglected in time of danger—

The wild mob's million feet
Will kick you from your place.
But then too late.

I commend that thought to the attention of the Minister and of the Government.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—When I listen to these marvellous military authorities I feel inclined to bow down in abject submission to them, except for the fact that history teaches us that all the improvements in munitions of war and in armament have come from civilians and not from men of the military type. There cannot be a greater reflection cast upon any body of men than that. Although military men profess to know all about the subject, we may be perfectly certain that they are least fitted to take charge of the organization of the defence of a country. What else can be expected? If the military field is the best calling for which a man thinks that he is fitted, what sort of a creature must he be? He might as well be a ram or a bull, because, apparently, his highest ambition is to be shot; and really I do not know why any one should deny him that pleasure if he wants it. That is how I feel when I hear these military men talking. I am a man of peace—especially when every one else agrees with me. Nothing annoys me more, and rouses a greater feeling of indignation within me, than when I hear people urging that we must waste pound after pound upon military equipment. Where is it going to end? Sooner than live in a state of constant dread of invasion, I would die a thousand times. I admit that we must place our country in a proper condition of defence. I do not object to that. But we ought to recognise one thing clearly, and that is that the men who go in for a military life are not the best men to organize and direct the defence of the country. Because, a man who goes in for a military life early in his career, does not have his brain stimulated, as does the man who has to compete with his fellows in civic life. After twenty years of military service, he is not fit to take his part in organizing warfare. Take England for instance, where there are many thousands of men trained to a military life. The army was actually using the old Brown Bess muzzle-loader thirty years after everybody in civil life who used a rifle was using a breech-loader. The more we begin to rely upon our volunteers for our defence the better it will be. There may be one exception to that rule in regard to the permanent artillery, because I do not think that it is possible to train men to be good shots in a few days. We should take every advantage of our civilian soldiers. Men who have taken up the practical work of defence with enthusiasm are likely to be the best for all practical purposes. I must again deplore the tendency on the part of some honorable members to favour the spending of a large sum of money on defence. If we must do that, let us spend half of it in introducing new settlers and putting them on the land. In that way we shall secure a body of men who will be able to take their share in the defence of the country, and we shall not have a mere phantom army.

Proposed vote agreed to.

APPROPRIATION (WORKS AND BUILDINGS) BILL.

Motion (by Sir JOHN FORREST) agreed to—

That the Standing Orders be suspended in order to enable all steps to be taken to pass the Appropriation (Works and Buildings) Bill through all its stages without delay.

Resolution of Committee of Supply reported and adopted.

In Committee of Ways and Means—

Motion (by Sir JOHN FORREST) proposed—

That towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty for additions, new works, buildings, &c., for the year 1905-6, a sum not exceeding £418,911 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—There was practically an arrangement come to that honorable members on this side should not object to the necessary motions in connexion with the Appropriation (Works and Buildings) Bill being taken as practically formal motions, since an opportunity has already been afforded for a full discussion of the various items in Committee of Supply. We are all aware that several very good reasons can be given against the suspension of the Standing Orders, especially when large sums of money are to be passed, but as honorable members have already had an opportunity to discuss the matters provided for in the Appropriation (Works and Buildings) Bill, it is not necessary to further refer to them at this stage.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Resolution reported and adopted.

Ordered—

That Mr. Deakin and Sir John Forrest do prepare and bring in a Bill to carry out the foregoing resolution.

Bill presented by Sir JOHN FORREST, and passed through all its stages without debate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

As the first business for to-morrow, we propose to proceed with the second reading of the Representation Bill, and after that with the Commerce Bill.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 11.17 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 13 September, 1905.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Senator DOBSON presented a petition from the Women's Christian Temperance Union, in Tasmania, praying that the importation of opium, except for medicinal purposes, shall be prohibited.

Petition received.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: QUORUM.

Senator MILLEN.—I ask you, sir, whether your attention has been directed to public statements to the effect that it is proposed in the other branch of the Parliament to alter the Standing Orders by a method which does not appear to conform to section 39 of the Constitution Act, and which appears to ignore the rights and duties of the Senate, and if so, whether you will take such steps as may appear to be necessary in order to safeguard or to assert its privileges?

The PRESIDENT.—My attention has not been specifically called to the matter. I have seen a statement in the press, but I do not think that it is within the sphere of my powers or functions to express an opinion as to the Standing Orders of the other House.

Senator MILLEN.—That is not my point, sir. What I asked was whether your attention had been drawn to a proposal made elsewhere, which would seem to indictate a departure from the Constitution Act, which secures to the Senate certain rights?

The PRESIDENT.—I cannot see how the Senate is affected.

Senator MILLEN.—Section 39 of the Constitution Act prescribes the quorum of the House of Representatives, and says it shall not be altered "until the Parliament otherwise provides." From what has appeared in the press and in the records of the other House, I assume that it is intended to alter that provision by a resolution of that House alone.

The PRESIDENT.—That is not the opinion which I have formed as to the proposed procedure. What I understand is intended to be done is to alter, not the quorum, but the machinery by which it can be ascertained. However, I do not wish to express an opinion.

At a later stage,

Senator DOBSON.—I wish to ask the Minister of Defence, without notice, whether it is not a privilege of the Senate that all Bills which are received from the other House shall have been considered and passed by no less than twenty-five members?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The honorable and learned senator can read the provision in the Constitution Act for himself, and as he is a member of the learned profession, very likely he will be able to form a better opinion than I, as a layman, can. If he will give notice of a question I shall get an answer.

NORTHERN TERRITORY.

Senator PEARCE.—I desire to ask the Minister of Defence, without notice, whether the Government will, as early as possible, supply honorable members with a copy of the report on the Northern Territory by the Governor of South Australia, as recently laid upon the table of its House of Assembly, more particularly the portion dealing with the question of the employment of coloured labour?

Senator PLAYFORD.—If it be the desire of honorable senators, I shall lay the paper upon the table.

HONORABLE SENATORS.—Hear, hear.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I shall lay my copy of the paper upon the table to-day.

CUSTOMS REGULATIONS ON OCEAN STEAMERS.

Senator MILLEN.—I desire to ask the Minister of Defence, without notice, whether his attention has been drawn to a letter in to-day's issue of the Argus practically confirming the statement I made here some time ago as to the character of a notice posted on the boats of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, and if so, whether he will look into the matter, and obtain that further information which he promised me six weeks ago should be forthcoming.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I asked that the information should be supplied to me, but up to the present time it has not been received. I shall look into the matter, and get the information as quickly as possible. My attention had not been previously called to the letter in question.

TARCOOLA POST OFFICE.

Senator MATHESON.—I wish to ask the Minister of Defence, without notice, whether he will lay upon the table, if possible to-morrow, a return showing the telegraphic revenue received at the Tarcoola post-office?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I shall make inquiries and place the return upon the table if I can.

PAPERS: PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Senator KEATING laid upon the table the following paper:—

Report of Pacific Cable Conference, 1905.

Ordered to be printed.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I beg to lay upon the table the following paper—

Report of the Governor of South Australia on his visit to the Northern Territory.

I move—

That the paper be printed.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to ask the leader of the Senate whether he will make an inquiry as to the work which the Printing Committee is or is not doing? I understand that for some weeks or months the Printing Committee has not done any active work, but that a similar body in another place does the work for which it was appointed. In that House, most of the papers which are laid upon the table are referred to the Printing Committee, which meets and resolves what papers should be printed, and reports accordingly. It is most desirable that our Printing Committee should follow that practice, and that we should have an opportunity of knowing that papers which are sought to be printed have been examined by a committee of five or seven men who think that they are worth printing. We are getting into a very loose habit of ordering a document to be printed on the motion of an honorable senator without any one else knowing whether it is of importance or not.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The Senate refused to give the Printing Committee any powers, and it declined to sit.

Senator DOBSON.—I should like Senator Playford to look into that matter, and see if he cannot make a suggestion for bringing the Printing Committee, or some other body, into active work with a view to saving a little money in the printing of documents.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—This is not a matter in which I should be asked to interfere. It is purely one for the Senate to deal with. A Minister has no control over the Senate or its officers. The course adopted in South Australia, might perhaps be adopted here with advantage. In each House of its Parliament, any documents which a Minister lays upon the table, and does not move to have printed, are referred to a Printing Committee. Through its chairman that body brings up a weekly report, which is read by the President or the Speaker, as the case may be, and which recommends that a paper bearing a certain number and title, should or should not be printed.

Senator MILLEN.—Has not the honorable senator heard the statement that the Printing Committee has declined to act in consequence of the action taken by the Senate?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not know that the Printing Committee has ever refused to act.

Senator MILLEN.—Where is the report of the Printing Committee?

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is not for me, but for the Senate to interfere in this matter. The officers are not under the control of the Executive, and therefore I cannot take any special action.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But the Printing Committee was appointed on the nomination of the Government. Cannot the honorable senator take steps to have that body disbanded if it has not done its duty?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No, I cannot. That is a matter for the Senate. I do not know that the Committee was nominated by the Government; but, if so, it was at the request of the Senate. So far from criticising the actions of the Committee, and taking any particular course in regard to it, I say that we have no business to do anything of the kind.

The PRESIDENT.—There has been no request that the Printing Committee should be called together.

Senator DOBSON.—Is it not for the leader of the Senate to take action?

The PRESIDENT.—No; the Government has nothing to do with the Committee. The Senate appointed the Committee, which has never asked that it should be called together. If it had one of the clerks of the Senate would have sent a circular to each of the members.

Senator MILLEN.—Would it be competent for a senator to move that some action be taken?

The PRESIDENT.—Certainly. The Committee is under the direction of the Senate, and will do what the Senate desires it to do.

Senator MILLEN.—But it will not.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not know that it will not. I am informed by the Clerk of the Parliaments, Mr. Blackmore, that nearly all the papers that have been laid upon the table are either in print, or have been ordered to be printed by the Senate. If that be so, what has the Printing Committee to do? It cannot say that a paper that has already been printed by order of the House of Representatives shall not be printed; nor can it say that a paper ordered by the Senate to be printed shall not be printed. Whether the Committee is to be called together or not is a matter for the consideration of its members, and not for the leader of the Senate, who has no more to do with the Committee than has any other senator.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I beg to lay upon the table the following paper:—

Copy of correspondence between the Premier of New South Wales and the Prime Minister re immigration and the Immigration Restriction Act.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—I move—

That the paper be printed.

With respect to the Printing Committee, my recollection is that we held one or two meetings.

The PRESIDENT.—Not this session.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—No, last session. We drew up certain rules of procedure, came to the Senate, and asked it to invest us with certain powers. We asked for exactly the same powers as the Printing Committee of the House of Representatives was invested with. We arranged that the two Committees should sit together, the chairman of the Senate Printing Committee, and the chairman of the House of Representatives Printing Committee presiding alternately. We asked that all papers laid upon the table should be referred to the Printing Committee, and that the two Printing Committees should jointly decide what should be printed, and what should not. When we brought our request before the Senate, Ministers opposed it, and if I remember rightly, you, sir, also did so.

The PRESIDENT.—No; all I did was to point out that the Senate itself had the ultimate right to say whether a paper should be printed.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—If papers laid upon the table of the Senate were not to be submitted to the Printing Committee, but were, at the instance of the Minister or of a senator to be ordered to be printed, it appeared that the Committee would have nothing to do. No papers were submitted to it, and it had no rights or powers whatever. The members of the Committee considered that it would have been simply foolish to meet under the circumstances. In my opinion there has been great waste and extravagance by the Senate in ordering many papers to be printed which never should have been printed; and which if referred to the Printing Committee would in all probability never have been printed. Some of them, I venture to say, were extremely expensive to print, have never been read by senators, and are practically of no use or interest. It is absolutely useless, however, to have a Printing Committee unless it has some powers. We asked for the same powers as the Printing Committee of the House of Representatives has; and as those powers were not given to us there was nothing for the Committee to do.

Senator PLAYFORD.—What power has the Printing Committee of the House of Representatives?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—All papers laid upon the Table of the House are submitted to it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Does not a Minister sometimes move that a paper be printed?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Not often, I think. I repeat that as the powers we asked for were not conferred, we had no reason for meeting, and consequently have not met since.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—The situation appears to be this—that the Printing Committee has no duties whatever in respect of papers which are laid upon the table of the Senate, and are ordered to be printed. I suppose that the powers of the Committee come into play only in relation to all papers that may be laid upon the table, but are not ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT.—That is the position.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—In relation to such papers the Committee could meet, consider them seriatim, and make recommendations with regard to their printing.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—And make an estimate of the cost.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No doubt. The difficulty with regard to the waste of money in the printing of unnecessary papers is due to the fact that perhaps too great facilities are afforded for the printing of papers. The remedy for that, I say with all deference to my honorable friend the Minister of Defence, is for the Government to exercise some kind of control over the papers that are ordered to be printed. Some papers are of importance. With regard to others, the members of the Government might move that they be referred to the Printing Committee for its consideration.

Senator DAWSON.—That is the rule now.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is a rule which is "more honoured in the breach than in the observance." Last year it was the practice of my honorable friend Senator Drake and myself to consider whether any particular paper that was to be laid upon the table ought to be printed or not.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We do the same.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But my honorable friend, with his easy-going good nature, allows papers to be printed that ought not to be printed.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That refers to the previous Government as well as to this one.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend adopts a tu quoque, which is not very appropriate while we are discussing this question. His remark is not true so far as concerns the late Government, but if it were true it would not enable him to get rid of the duty that rests upon him, and which he has been a little slack in discharging. He has a duty in respect to the Senate and to the Printing Committee. That duty is that when a paper is laid on the table by himself, or by Senator Keating, if a motion is submitted, he shall state whether he thinks it is desirable that it should be printed, or be referred to the Printing Committee. If that course were followed, the occupation of the Printing Committee would not be gone. It would have something to do, and there would be some reason for calling it together. That would obviate unnecessary printing, and would prevent an order of the Senate being made for the printing of a paper without sufficient information as to its value. My honorable friend has the remedy in his own hands.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—Since I have been a member of the Senate every senator has desired that every paper which was thought worthy of being placed upon the table of the Senate should be printed. If that is the case I do not see where the responsibility of the Government comes in, nor what need there is for a Printing Committee. My contention is that if any paper is of sufficient importance to be laid upon the table it ought to be printed. Honorable senators cannot be expected to wade through pages and pages of writing and typescript.

Senator HIGGS.—The fact that the printing of documents costs money ought to appeal to the honorable senator.

Senator STEWART.—The cost does not appeal to me. My honorable friend may be one of those "penny-wise and pound-foolish" people of whom we sometimes hear. I do not profess to be one of them. We are here to do the business of the country, and we ought to do it in the best possible way. We cannot be expected to wade through piles of manuscript in search of important facts. The records of the Senate are of sufficient importance for them to be printed. We cannot carry on the government of the country without expenditure, and there is no use in "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel."

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I share Senator Stewart's opinion that every paper that is of sufficient importance to be laid upon the table of the Senate ought to be printed, and that we ought not to be at the mercy of a Committee which may be influenced one way or another as to the importance of a particular paper. I can instance a case which afforded me considerable annoyance. Last session, or perhaps the session before, a very interesting pile of letters was laid upon the table for our inspection. They had reference to Government House, Sydney. I made some notes from them. Those letters are not now available, because they were not printed. Apparently, they did not reach the hands of the Clerk in the ordinary formal way. They would be particularly valuable in connexion with a series of letters which have been printed. The letters to which I allude were handed to the Commonwealth Government by Sir Harry Rawson, Governor of New South Wales. The letters which have been printed were handed to the Government by the present Government of New South Wales. The two lots of letters throw a most interesting light one on the other. This is a case in point, which shows the desirableness of printing nearly every paper laid upon the table. Senator Smith has raised the question of petitions; and here is an example of what may happen under the present system. Here we have what, to my mind, is an absolutely unimportant petition, which has been put into print at the instance of the Printing Committee of another place.

Senator DAWSON.—Does not that only show that a joint Committee is required?

Senator MATHESON.—I do not think that a joint Committee is necessary. If an honorable senator succeeds in passing a motion that a return be laid upon the table, he ought to be entitled to have that paper printed, with the sanction of the Senate, and without reference to any Committee. It is obvious that an honorable senator would not submit a motion of the kind unless he were acquainted with the contents of the return, and deemed them to be of value, or desired that they should be circulated for some useful purpose.

Senator DAWSON.—Let us return to the old standing order, which empowered a Minister to move that a paper be printed.

Senator MATHESON.—The Minister, or any honorable senator, has at present the power to move that a paper be printed, and it is for the Senate to agree or disagree; and, so far as my experience goes, that is the best position.

Senator MILLEN.—The logical thing would be to abolish the Committee.

Senator MATHESON.—So far as the functions of the Committee are concerned in sitting in judgment on what has or has not to be printed, it might fairly be abolished. I presume, however, that they have other duties.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

APPROPRIATION (WORKS AND BUILDINGS) BILL.

Bill received from the House of Representatives, and, on motion by Senator KEATING, read a first time.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH asked the Minister representing the Minister of External Affairs, upon notice—

1. Has the attention of the Minister of External Affairs been called to the statements constantly made by prominent men in Great Britain that the Commonwealth will have to alter the provisions of her Immigration Restriction Act so far as Japan is concerned?

2. Has the attention of the Minister of External Affairs been directed to an article written by the London correspondent of the Age, appearing in the issue of that journal of the 26th August, which contains the following:—"Mr. Archibald Colquhoun, for thirty years a close student of Eastern affairs, and the writer of two books dealing with the commercial and strategic future of the Pacific . . . appears to assume that Australia will acquiesce without much resistance in whatever course British policy—which will have to comprehend the interests of Manchester, Birmingham, and Liverpool, among other places—may ultimately dictate”?

3. At the Premiers' Conference held in London, in 1897, did the Right Honorable Joseph Chamberlain, in speaking of the Colonial Immigration Acts, say:—“I have seen these Bills, and they differ in some respects one from the other, but there is no one of them, except, perhaps, the Bill which comes to us from Natal, to which we can look with satisfaction. I wish to say that Her Majesty's Government thoroughly appreciate the object and the needs of the Colonies in dealing with this matter. We quite sympathize with the determination of the white inhabitants of those Colonies which are in comparatively close proximity to millions and hundreds of millions of Asiatics that there shall not be an influx of people alien in civilization, alien in religion, alien in customs, whose influx, moreover, would most seriously interfere with the legitimate rights of the existing labour population. An immigration of that kind must, I quite understand, in the interests of the Colonies, be prevented at all hazards”?

4. Is not the Commonwealth Immigration Restriction Act based on the same principles as the Natal Act?

5. Did not the six colonies prior to Federation all have more or less effective Immigration Restriction Acts?

6. Will the Government see that an authoritative denial is given to the press statements referred to, in view of the fact that any misunderstanding may jeopardize the interests of the Commonwealth in the provisions of the proposed renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. The Minister is aware that a few writers have either stated or hinted at such a contingency. Mr. Colquhoun appears to be the most prominent among them.

2, 3, 4, and 5 are answered in the affirmative.

6. It is reported that the Anglo-Japanese Treaty has already been renewed, and an announcement of its terms is expected very soon. In view of the explicit official statement of the Secretary of State for the Colonies quoted in question No. 3, it is confidently concluded that His Majesty's Government is not only acquainted with the sentiment of the Commonwealth in this matter, but appreciates our object and our needs in dealing with this matter.

HIGH COURT.

Senator STEWART asked the Minister representing the Attorney-General, upon notice—

What was the total expense caused by the postponement of the sitting of the High Court in Melbourne, from the 2nd to the 9th of May, 1905?

Senator KEATING.—The amount was £15.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does that amount include the expenses of the defendants and their witnesses?

Senator KEATING.—I presume not; the questions asked do not deal with that matter.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the amount include the heavier fees insisted on by counsel? I ask this question because I dare say Senator Keating is aware that the Crown Solicitor reported that, in consequence of the sudden adjournment, counsel required heavier fees, on the ground that their engagements for the week were put off.

Senator KEATING.—I presume not. I do not know that the Government have any means of demanding that information from counsel.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Government have the information.

Senator KEATING.—The question asked by Senator Stewart was as to the total expense—that is the expense over which the Commonwealth had any control.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is the Minister aware that the Crown Solicitor reported that heavier fees were required?

Senator KEATING.—I do not know whether this is a cross-examination or not.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is not the way in which to answer a question. If the Minister has not the information let him say so.

Senator KEATING.—If the honorable and learned senator wishes for this detailed information, I ask him to give detailed notice.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I shall certainly give notice.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS BILL.

Bill presented, and on motion by Senator KEATING read a first time.

COPYRIGHT BILL.

In Committee (consideration resumed from 30th August, vide page 1652):

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Interpretation).

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—This clause contains definitions of terms which occur in very many places throughout the Bill; and, following the practice that has been adopted on previous occasions in connexion with lengthy measures, and which is in conformity with the procedure of the British House of Parliament, I suggest that the consideration of the clause be postponed until after the main provisions have been dealt with. In English Bills, the definitions are, or were, usually placed at the end, but in Australia, for convenience more than for any other reason, they are placed at the beginning. If we pass the definitions as they stand, we may find that we have, to a certain extent, circumscribed ourselves in regard to amendments later on in other clauses. I move—

That the clause be postponed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I commend Senator Keating for the wise course he has taken in moving, for the reasons given, the postponement of the consideration of this clause. This is not a Bill for party discussion; and, seeing that we are endeavouring to legislate with a view to practically codifying the law in relation to copyright, and to bringing that law up to date, it is desirable that we should all assist, as far as possible, to that end. It is perfectly possible that all honorable senators may not be present when the other clauses have been dealt with, and clause 4 comes before us again, and I should like to make one or two suggestions with a view to improving definitions which have been introduced. I ask honorable senators to consider the suggestions I make, not merely in relation to this clause, but also in relation to other clauses. I dare say Senator Keating will forgive me for sounding a sort of preliminary note of warning as to the source of a large number of the new clauses. According to a very useful paper which has been circulated, those clauses have been taken, not from any legislation now in force, but from a Bill which has been before only one branch of the British Parliament. We must not, therefore, adopt those new clauses on the assumption that they have any authority from previous legislation, because the Bill in England has never yet been considered by the British Parliament.

Senator KEATING.—The Bill was considered in the House of Lords, and sent on to the House of Commons.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We do not attach overwhelming importance to the fact that a Bill has been considered by one branch of the Legislature.

Senator KEATING.—The gentlemen who did give attention to this Bill in the House of Lords are very able authorities on the subject.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — That was in 1900, since which time the measure has remained in the limbo of neglected Bills. We cannot regard it as having passed through the fire of parliamentary criticism, or as having been followed by practical application and experience. These particular clauses have not, therefore, the legislative stamp upon them, nor have we the advantage of any practical experience of their working as a part of the law of the land. They may be good or bad, but I am sure Senator Keating would not ask honorable senators to accept them merely because they happened to appear in the English Bill. They have really no more weight as having been taken from that Bill than have the recommendations of the Royal Commission which sat now thirty years ago, in 1875, and reported twenty-seven years ago in relation to the law of copyright. Its report has for twenty-seven years lain in the archives of the Imperial Parliament, gathering dust. No step in the form of legislation appears to have been taken until the introduction of the Bill of 1900. I take great exception to some of these clauses, and whether they be good or bad in the opinion of others we should apply to them our own original consideration, and adopt them if we are satisfied that their objects, and the methods adopted for carrying out those objects, are good, and not simply because they bear the stamp or imprimatur of the Imperial Legislature, which they do not. I take the opportunity on this clause of making these remarks as applicable to a large number of the clauses which the very useful document circulated amongst us indicates to be clauses taken from the Copyright Bill of 1900 and the Copyright (Artistic) Bill of the same year. With regard to this clause itself, I invite Senator Keating to consider between now and the time at which he will submit it to the acceptance of the Committee, whether the word "author" should not be defined. There is a definition as to what it shall include, and it is provided that it shall extend to the personal representatives of an author, but there is no definition of the word. It seems to me that that is especially necessary.

Senator DAWSON.—Does it not mean the actual author or his representative?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think Senator Dawson will find that the definition might be improved, and it should be inserted in the interpretation clause, instead of in another part of the Bill. I suggest to Senator Keating also that throughout the definition clause wherever possible he should adhere to the word "includes" instead of using the word "means." For instance, in the Bill it is provided that an artistic work "includes," or an author "includes," whilst a book "means." The word "includes" will give exactly the same effect, and will not shut out the ordinary interpretation.

Senator KEATING.—We should make all the definitions inclusive?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes, all inclusive. I have often found that in drafting a measure it is very much more satisfactory to use the word "includes," and I suggest its use for the consideration of my honorable and learned friend.

Senator DAWSON.—How would it apply to a lecture?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There would be no difficulty about that. It is worthy of consideration whether we could not improve the definition of the word "author" in its relation to a lecture.

Senator KEATING.—Whether it means the man who writes or the man who recites?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Whether it is the man who writes, or delivers, or both. There seems to me to be a gap here, and, if possible, we should close it up. I invite consideration of the effect of including "newspaper" in the definition of a "book" in relation to the other clauses of the Bill. Senator Keating will find that it is also included in the definition of a "periodical."

Senator KEATING.—But the two words "periodical" and "book" are not exclusive throughout the Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—They are not exclusive, but in looking through the other clauses my honorable and learned friend will find that it will be well to keep to one definition of a particular subject of copyright. If we do not, it will, I think, be found that there is nothing more likely to create confusion in the administration of such a measure as this, which in some respects is more intricate and complex than is a Patents Act than a departure from that principle. We should define the word "book" as including "newspaper," or the word "periodical" as including "newspaper," and not have two different words defined to include the same thing. Then in the definition of "lecture," I do not quite know what is meant by the expression "a piece for recitation." A piece for recitation would ordinarily mean a poem written by some one else, an arrangement of poems, or an arrangement of some rhetorical and eloquent piece of prose. The phrase is not very intelligible to me. In offering some observations on the second reading of the Bill, I referred to the definition of "publication." The matter is the subject of considerable discussion in the Publishers' Circular of May last, in which some questions are asked indicating this difficulty, which I invite my honorable and learned friend to consider. We know that a number of books are published for private circulation. We know also that there are a number of literary societies—Shelley, Shakspeare, and Browning societies, and a number of others. There are also scientific societies, which issue their proceedings and reports to members and subscribers only. In addition, they sometimes publish works which may be out of print for the benefit of their members and subscribers, and issue them to those persons only. In the case of books printed for private circulation, the result will be that if that private circulation does not amount to publication, and we do not make it publication, the copyright will not begin to run.

Senator DAWSON.—The book will not be "up for sale."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What I am suggesting is that we should make it publication.

Senator PEARCE.—Does not the expression "or the first distribution of copies of it" cover that?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think that probably it was intended to cover it. What I suggest is that after the words to which Senator Pearce has called attention, there should be added the words "whether marked for private circulation or not, and whether to subscribers or to private friends or not."

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator is proposing to penalize a free gift.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No: what we are dealing with is the law of copyright. On the one hand, we desire to protect the interests of authors, and on the other hand we wish to give the community the benefit of these books. The same mischief is created if the author of a book should make an edition of, say, twenty copies. No one else has the right to reprint that book. He has made his publication, and if he has sold his copyright, the result will be that the first edition of the book will increase enormously in value, and if it suits the publisher, ten years afterwards, when the value of the book has increased enormously, he may publish another very limited edition, and the general public will be unable to secure the book at all. So it is with books published for private circulation. Many persons adopt this course from a retiring disposition, and unwillingness to offer themselves to public criticisms—to seem to be publishing a book for sale—and for various other reasons. Some of them forget that the public have also an interest in their books, and that their benefit to the community must be considered as against the rights of the authors.

Senator PEARCE.—Would not the honorable senator's proposal play into the hands of those who would keep their books from the public?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No; if they are published for private circulation only, there are two things which will result: they will remain the private property of the author, and no copyright attach to them. No other person can print them. On the other hand, if such a distribution is declared to be publication, then the author will be entitled to the copyright from the date of that distribution.

Senator PEARCE.—And he can make his own terms as to the publication of such books?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Exactly in the same way as the author of any other book. But if he publishes for private circulation, the copyright does not begin to run against him until publication for the public.

Senator PEARCE.—But he could not prevent any one pirating his book.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Certainly he could, because it would not be public property.

Senator PEARCE.—Under the common law?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes, under the common law. We step in with our legislation and give him a legislative copyright from the moment of publication to the world; but if he keeps his hand on the book and marks it private there is no publication. That is a difficulty which has already arisen, and a perfectly impractical proposal has been suggested in America to make two kinds of copyrights, one a sort of private copyright, and the other a public copyright. That, of course, is only introducing complexity. My own view is that the expression, "or the first distribution of copies of it" may cover my suggestion. Probably it was so intended; but it should be made more clear.

Senator KEATING.—That was the intention.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am sure it must have been the intention, because it is the modern idea that if there is a system of copyright established there should not at the same time be something else which would give an absolute right to deprive the public of the benefit of the work, which is in reality published, although not technically.

Senator DAWSON.—Will the definition of pirated book meet the difficulty?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That does not touch the point, because there is no copyright. This provision relates to books which are circulated amongst friends for private use. There is no copyright in the books, and they cannot be reprinted by any one but the authors. What I suggest is to make it quite clear whether they are marked for private circulation or not, and whether issued to subscribers or to private friends or not.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I am very glad to have had the advantage of the criticism of some of the definitions by Senator Symon. But while I do not agree in every instance that there is a necessity for any of the alterations he has indicated, still everything he has said will receive the fullest consideration, and I can assure him and others that the whole subject-matter of the clause will receive the best possible attention before it is again considered, in order that it may be framed in such a way as to give proper effect to the desire of Parliament. With regard to the criticism which Senator Symon directed to the sources of many of these clauses—the clauses in the Copyright Bill and the Copyright (Artistic) Bill—I agree with him that they have not yet received the stamp of legislative authority. While one of these Bills was passing through the House of Lords, it was dealt with by gentlemen than whom perhaps few men in the Empire are more qualified to speak on this important department of law. The honorable and learned senator has said that for that reason we should be to some extent chary in giving the same force and consideration to these clauses as we would if they were the substance of an enactment which had borne the test of experience. That is perfectly correct, but at the same time I would take this occasion to remind honorable senators that in the instances in which we have taken advantage of these clauses, we have not in many cases slavishly followed their verbiage. In some instances, as they will see by reference to the memorandum, we have taken the substance of the clauses and improved upon them, as we think. In other instances, the clauses have been adopted perhaps bodily, but most of these clauses were not new, and contained nothing novel or original or the part of their framers. They were merely a concise expression of the common law on the subject, as it has been determined during the last century or more, by the judicial interpretations given by the various courts. Honorable senators may think sometimes that, in adopting a clause practically as it stood in the Copyright Bill, we were subject to the criticism which has been levelled at us by Senator Symon, that we were adopting something for which there is no legislative warrant, and which has not had the actual test of experience. But during the course of their inquiries, the Royal Commission to which he referred, and which sat some twenty-seven or thirty years ago, not merely confined themselves to the existing statute law, but considered the operation of that law, how it affected the public generally, authors, and publishers, and also how it had been interpreted from time to time by the various judicial tribunals. Where it was possible, as it was in many instances, to get from the number of cases in which there was no conflict a clear and correct expression of a principle of law, they adopted it, and put it in a concise form, making it statutory instead of common law. In such instances, I think we have been perfectly justified, so long as the verbiage was all that could be desired, in adopting clauses which are merely a concrete expression of the common law. In circulating this memorandum, and drawing the attention of honorable senators to similar provisions elsewhere, we are not seeking by any means to wrongly impress on their minds that the clauses which in many instances have been the sources of these provisions, have anything like legislative authority. I think that the only reason why they have not the force of legislative authority is that assigned by Mr. Scrutton, whom I quoted in my second-reading speech, that the block of business in the House of Commons has for many years been so great, and there are subjects of such party and vital interest arising there every day, that matters of this character are, by the greater number of honorable members, practically looked upon as being of an academic character.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The copyright law of England, although distributed over a great number of Acts, is a very satisfactory one.

Senator KEATING.—Yes, but it is very difficult for any person, who does not apply himself to its study for a great length of time, to become familiar with it in detail.

Motion agreed to; clause postponed.

Clause 5 agreed to.

No copyright, performing right, or lecturing right, shall subsist under this Act in any profane, indecent, seditious, or libellous work or matter.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—"Profane" is a very vague term indeed to use. I do not know what it means. Of course, we are accustomed to the expression "sacred and profane literature." I think that the word blasphemous expresses what we intend shall not have the benefit of copyright. I move—

That the word "profane" be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "blasphemous."

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I have no objection to the amendment, because I think the word "blasphemous" is more explicit than the word "profane." The distinction between sacred and profane is one that might vary, according to the standard of each person. Moreover, the word "blasphemous" is used in connexion with the subject in most of the English text books.

Senator STEWART.—What is the definition of the word blasphemous?

Senator KEATING.—In many instances the Courts have determined what does and what does not constitute blasphemy.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I can see that unless we have a definition of this word serious injury may be done to certain persons. I would suggest the omission of the words "profane" and "blasphemous." I do not see why my freedom of thought should be restricted in that direction.

Amendment agreed to.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I move—

That the word "indecent" be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "immoral."

Senator Keating will recollect that a good many years ago it was decided, in the Bradlaugh case, that unless the work was of a very grave and prurient character the word indecent could not be applied. This was laid down in the case of the prosecution of the book entitled The Fruits of Philosophy. Of course, all such books would be covered by the expression "immoral." I do not think that any one of us desires that an immoral publication, so decided by the Courts, ought to be the subject of copyright.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I do not see that it would be an advantage to substitute the word "immoral" for the word "indecent," because, however wide and vague the term "profane" may be, the term "immoral" is still more wide and vague. The question of morality, or immorality, especially in connexion with literature, is one upon which it would be very difficult to get any two minds to agree. There are books which are written in the ordinary course, and read very widely by persons of both sexes and of all ages. To the minds of some persons, these works are perfectly pure and moral, but to the minds of others they are highly immoral. The term "immoral" is too wide and comprehensive, and likely to be subject to many different interpretations. If the word "indecent" does not meet with the approval of the Committee, the word "obscene" might meet the cases with which we wish to deal, but I think the word "immoral" is capable of too varied an interpretation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think it would be better to use the word "obscene."

Senator DOBSON.—Is not the word "indecent" used in many of our Crimes Acts?

Senator KEATING.—Yes; and if honorable senators wish to strengthen the clause we might insert also the word "obscene."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I would not do that.

Senator KEATING.—The word "immoral" is one the meaning of which we should never be able to be certain.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Will the honorable senator quote clause 4 of the English Bill?

Senator KEATING.—The Copyright Bill as passed through the House of Lords, in clause 4, sub-clause 4, contained the words "any profane, indecent, seditious, or libellous book." The word "immoral" would be too varying a term. One might, for instance, ask for the opinion of the public generally as to the twelve most immoral books that have recently been published; and I venture to say that perhaps 80 or 100 books would be heavily voted for as coming under that description. Some books which have been published within the last five years are considered by some people to be immoral, whilst other members of the community take quite a contrary view. It will be convenient to adhere to the words of the Copyright Bill as passed by the House of Lords as far as possible, so that in the event of the Imperial Parliament hereafter passing this legislation, our measure will be uniform with theirs.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—I trust that the Government will not agree to the insertion of the word "immoral." If that were done we should be brought face to face with difficulties arising through the indefiniteness of the word, and should never know where we were. The word "immoral" is often used with regard to political works. I have heard it applied to the teachings of Henry George, and to the single tax.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is political immorality; but that is not the sense in which the word is here used.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is an instance of the vagueness of the word. I am afraid that if it were inserted in this Bill, many such hair-splitting definitions would be given, and we do not know what injustices might be done. The word "indecent," or "blasphemous," would be far more definite than the word "immoral." It would never do to put in an Act of Parliament a word that would lead to so much difference of opinion. I can quite believe that Senator Symon, looking at the matter from a professional stand-point, might like to insert a word that would lead to much profit to the lawyers, but we do not want to make our Acts of Parliament a means of increasing the number of cases in the law courts.

Senator KEATING.—This clause would apply to plays as well, and it would be a very difficult question in such a case.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is very difficult to say where the immoral aspect of a play arises.

Senator GIVENS.—The word "indecent" is almost as vague.

Senator DE LARGIE.—To my own satisfaction, I can interpret the word "indecent," but I should have some difficulty in saying what was immoral.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—My honorable friend Senator de Largie stopped when he was getting most interesting. I thought he was about to define the word "indecent," but he abstained from that exceedingly interesting effort. I frankly confess that if I could think of any word that would carry out the sense and intention of the Legislature better than the word "immoral," I should prefer it. My idea, of course, is to avoid those consequences to which my honorable friend alluded, as leading to undue litigation. We ought to see to it that the language of our Acts of Parliament is so expressed that the possibilities of dispute are as far as possible avoided. What impresses me in relation to the word "indecent" is this: There is very great difficulty in saying to what books it applies.

Senator GIVENS.—How would "prurient" do?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think that would be better than "indecent," but "immoral" is the best word of the three. The word "indecent" is extremely difficult to define in relation to the law of copyright, so as to exclude from its benefit the authors of productions which may be described as indecent. I do not think, for instance, that any one would wish to give the advantage of copyright to books like The Fruits of Philosophy. There may be a demand for books of that character greater than for other books which could be mentioned. What we want to stop is the making of such books a profitable property in the hands of their authors. For myself, I say at once that such a book as The Fruits of Philosophy should not have the advantage of copyright. That is what we ought to stop.

place as to that book, the point was raised as to its being an "indecent publication," and the prosecution failed. It was not regarded by the Court as indecent; and, therefore, such a book would be protected by copyright, and the consequent profits from its sale would go into the pockets of the author.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Would not the result have been the same if the term used had been "immoral"?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No, I think not. The word "immoral" is much wider, and would have enabled the Court to say that the book was a violation of the law, and came within the definition of "immoral book." But as the word used was "indecent," the Court said that the publication was not an indecent one; it was an immoral book, but not indecent in the legal sense of the term as being calculated to arouse passion. It is from that point of view that I think "immoral" is the better word for the purpose of preventing copyright being extended to books which are in a grosser sense immoral. We can all attach a definition to the word "immoral," and it would be for the Court to say whether a book came within the legal definition or not. Senator Keating says that the word is too wide to use in a law of copyright, by which we are giving a property to authors in their books. I think it would be better to have a larger and wider word than "indecent," which has been subject to decisions and has been found practically to be insufficient. My honorable friend said something in regard to plays which might be regarded as having immoral tendencies. But we cannot stop that. It is not the purpose of this Bill to stop anything of that kind. Its purpose is not to give a property to the author of a production which violates certain conditions. My honorable friend also said that we should retain the word "indecent" in order to secure uniformity with the Bill which was passed by the House of Lords. But we have not that uniformity yet, and the probability is—or, at least, there is a possibility—of that word, in the light of the decision in the Bradlaugh case, being eliminated, and another more effective word for the purpose we have in view being substituted. If my honorable friend feels strongly about the amendment, I will not press it, but ask him to reconsider the point, so that we may have another opportunity of dealing with it; and I am quite sure that he will see that we require some other word than "indecent," which has been tried and found wanting, not for the purpose of preventing the publication of books or dramatic pieces which a hypersensitive man might regard as having an immoral tendency, but of preventing works having that tendency acquiring copyright and thereby becoming a profitable property to their authors.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—We should be careful not to insert any provision which may take away an author's right to his own productions simply because of any feeling of prejudice which may exist in the mind of the general public. It must be remembered that some of the finest writers of the race to which we belong have at various times written books which a great many people have regarded as both immoral and indecent; and even now classics of the English language are held to be open to that condemnation. Take Byron, for instance. Some of his finest works are commonly set down as sensual, and a great many people look upon them as being highly indecent and immoral.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The same can be said of the Bible.

Senator PEARCE.—And of the works of Shakspeare.

Senator GIVENS.—I had intended to allude to those books. Some of the finest descriptive poetry in the English language was written by Byron, and occurs in his Don Juan, which is usually regarded as most sensual, and by some as the most indecent and immoral work of poetry we have in the language. Even Shakspeare, who is recognised as being perhaps the greatest poet and dramatist the world has yet produced, has written passages which very many people would say are absolutely immoral and indecent.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Even if there were one questionable passage, nobody would say that a poet's works were immoral or indecent on that account.

Senator GIVENS. — A poet does not publish his works in globo, but may issue them in fugitive pieces at a time. I do not think that Byron ever published more than two cantos of Don Juan at a time, and that poem is held to be immoral and indecent by the prudes of the community. It would be unfair for any Parliament to attempt to limit a genius in that way.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Does the fact that Byron wrote the poems make them less indecent or immoral?

Senator GIVENS.—The general community have recognised that Byron's works are only immoral and indecent to the prudes of the community.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That would apply to the work mentioned by Senator Symon.

Senator GIVENS.—Almost every poet is open to the same charge at the hands of the prudes, and I might name Shakspeare, Pope, Shelley, and others. Even Robbie Burns, the immortal Scotch poet, is regarded in some quarters as immoral and indecent in some of his poems. I would suggest the word "prurient" as being better than "indecent," because it has a far stronger meaning. I am sure we have no desire to give any property in a prurient work.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think anybody would publish a book which was indecent within the definition in the Bradlaugh case.

Senator GIVENS.—But the owner of the copyright might be put to considerable expense and trouble by having to resort to litigation in order to establish his rights. There are people who regard a nude statue as indecent; but, of course, a work of art of that kind is only indecent to the prudes.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I have suggested the substitution of the word "immoral," but I shall not persist with the amendment if Senator Keating is of opinion that the word "indecent" is sufficient. What we desire to do is to prevent the acquisition of a valuable property in a book which comes within a particular description.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I have listened to the remarks of various honorable senators, and I am still of opinion that it would be very undesirable to substitute "immoral" for "indecent." The word "immoral" is wide and vague, and capable of being variously interpreted according to the individual charged with the interpretation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Surely we do not wish to give copyright in an immoral book?

Senator KEATING.—Quite so. I have not with me the decision in the Bradlaugh case; but I know that many points of law assisted in its final determination. I should like to point out the way in which this clause is most likely to be brought into operation. Clause 13 provides—

Copyright shall subsist in every book, whether the author is a British subject or not, which has, after the commencement of this Act, been first published in Australia, before or simultaneously with its first publication elsewhere.

Under that provision, if a book of an immoral or indecent character is first published in Australia, or, in Australia simultaneously with its publication elsewhere, there is copyright without registration. The question of determining whether or not a book is immoral or indecent, and, as such, is disqualified from copyright, will most likely arise when some private individual pirates the book, and the author or owner of the copyright takes proceedings to restrain him, or brings an action for damages for infringement. In such a case, the defendant would set up the defence that the plaintiff was not the owner of a copyright, because the book was of an "immoral" or "indecent" character—whichever word may be used. Such a case would hardly ever arise, unless the book was of such a strong character, either immorally or indecently, that some private individual, from the knowledge he had of it, regarded it as not entitled to copyright; and then it would come under the consideration of the Court. Under the Bill, when an author or owner of a copyright desires to bring an action for damages or to restrain piracy by injunction, he has first to register; and the registrar might hold a book to be immoral. It would then be impossible for the author or alleged owner of the copyright, to sue at all, unless he obtained from a Judge a mandamus or a rectification order compelling the registrar to register, and that mandamus or order, of course, would be on the grounds that the book was not immoral. When we consider how this clause is likely to operate, with the word "indecent" in it, it does not seem likely that anybody will be able to get copyright in an immoral publication. Even if we inserted a stronger and wider term, such as "immoral," it would still be necessary for some third party to take action in the nature of piracy, before the question could arise. An owner of a copyright in a book published in Australia would, as I say, not have to register until his rights were infringed, and he wished to take action. If, on the other hand, the book was not published under the provision of the sub-section I have just quoted, but was produced abroad, and the author wished to get the benefit of the international provisions of this Bill, he would come here with his certificate. I do not think that even if we made the amendment suggested, and an author came from abroad with an immoral or indecent book, he could be denied the benefits of the international registration, because we are bound by the reciprocating terms of the Berne Convention. Under the circumstances, I think it is perfectly safe to use the term "indecent," because, whether we use one term or the other, and split straws as to what is or what is not immoral, it will still remain for some individual in the community to take action, before the question of the immorality or indecency of a work can be decided. And no individual would take action unless he felt that he could pirate the book without any danger, on the ground that it was not entitled to copyright under clause 6. No one would pirate a book because he thought it immoral, or on the border line, but would wait until its character was bad enough to enable him to pirate it on the ground that it was what we call indecent. After all, the censor in the community would be the individual who wished to take advantage of this clause, in order to make some profit himself, and to be able to defend himself from an action for piracy on the ground that the book was of such a bad character that it came within the prohibition of clause 6.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Senator Keating is quite right in saying that the question of the moral character of a book would arise when some body attempted piracy, and the author endeavoured to prevent him. But Senator Keating has missed the point, which is that a copyright gives a valuable property to the person who writes the book, and that, if copyright be withheld on the ground of indecency, there will be no inducement to people to write indecent and immoral books. What we are legislating for is to do justice to authors by converting an intangible thing, in which there is no property under certain circumstances, into a tangible and profitable possession. There are certain productions which we ought not to make valuable, and, therefore, we withhold the temptation to write books on the assumption that they will be a profitable property. Books are written in order that they may be sold; and if there is no temptation to write them, the possibility of piracy does not come into play. No doubt if such books were copyrighted, the question would arise as between the pirate and the original author, but we wish to stop the writing and publication of them, or, at any rate, to withhold from them a profitable copyright. The probability is that when this matter is further considered, it will be found to be desirable to eliminate the word "indecent." I have suggested a word which has a definition and a scope that would prevent a copyright being acquired for a book of the particular description under discussion.

Senator KEATING.—State legislation may do much in the way of restricting the printing of such books.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — But it would not take away the property in the copyright, and might be interpreted differently from Commonwealth legislation. The word "indecent" appears to me insufficient, and I admit that the word "immoral" is open to criticism as to its scope. I cannot think of a more appropriate word, though "prurient" is very good. The matter had better be given further consideration before we vote as to a change.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Application of the Common Law).

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I see no reason to legislate that the common law of England shall apply, but a clause of this kind at once raises a doubt as to whether it prevails here. The common law of England is in full force unless altered by Statute; and, in my opinion, the clause ought to be eliminated.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—This clause deals with unpublished literary compositions, that is, with the manuscripts of authors. In its strictest sense one could hardly say that the law dealing with unpublished literary manuscript is copyright law because copyright law does not come into force in its truest sense until a manuscript has been published. But this is a subject which has always been considered cognate to the law of copyright.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We do not alter the law of England with regard to unpublished manuscript.

Senator KEATING.—There are several curious features of the law dealing with unpublished manuscripts, but they are all dealt with by the text-book writers on the subject of copyright. For instance if an author becomes bankrupt his unpublished literary manuscript does not pass to the trustee or assignee in bankruptcy, whereas his copyright does. Again, so far as manuscript is concerned, an assignment of it does not of itself carry with it to the assignee the right to publish it. There are other peculiar features about it, but the main point in connexion with us and with this clause is that according to the law at present, if an author does not publish his manuscript and it gets into the hands of any one else, he has the power at common law to restrain the publication of that manuscript. In order to do that he has to invoke the intervention of a Court. If we pass this Bill without this clause, and an author were to take out an injunction in a Victorian Court to restrain some person from publishing his unpublished literary manuscript that injunction would have force and effect throughout the State of Victoria only. If the person prohibited from publishing that manuscript went to South Australia, there would be nothing to prevent him disregarding the injunction of the Victorian Court, and publishing it there.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But that does not touch this Bill. The clause does not deal with procedure.

Senator KEATING.—Undoubtedly; but at present the common law of England with regard to unpublished manuscript does not apply throughout the Commonwealth as one area.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Undoubtedly it does. The common law of England applies throughout the Commonwealth except where it has been altered by Statute.

Senator KEATING. — It applies throughout the Commonwealth in the sense that it applies throughout the six different States. Some few years ago Mr. Arnold, who brought some plays out here, took proceedings in New South Wales, by means of an application for an injunction, to restrain a man from infringing his performing rights in those plays. He succeeded in getting a common law injunction in restraint of this man.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It would be an injunction in equity.

Senator KEATING.—I understand that he took out a common law injunction to restrain this man from infringing his performing right; but the man got across the Queensland border, and then snapped his fingers at the injunction.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Arnold could have taken the same action in Queensland.

Senator KEATING. — But he would have had to go to Queensland to do so.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — So he would if this clause were passed.

Senator KEATING. — No; I submit that if we pass this clause the common law will apply throughout the Commonwealth.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — This will not affect procedure.

Senator KEATING. — Undoubtedly the passing of this clause will make the common law apply throughout the Commonwealth as one area, and then any injunction which might be obtained in a competent Court in any one of the States to restrain publication by a certain person of the unpublished literary manuscript of another would operate not merely in that State, but throughout the whole of the Commonwealth.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia). — I must say that I have been staggered to hear my honorable and learned friend attempt a defence of this clause. I say, after the very greatest consideration, that he has confused two things—procedure and the operation of the principles of common law. It is quite an elementary thing, and a point with which I am sure my honorable and learned friend is familiar, that the common law of England applies throughout the whole of the Commonwealth.

Senator KEATING. — As a Commonwealth?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — As a Commonwealth. It applies throughout the Commonwealth and in every State. Every student, as my honorable and learned friend must know perfectly well, recognises that as an elementary principle. Then the honorable and learned senator says that if steps are taken to protect unpublished manuscript in one State, and an order is made restraining its publication, that order is not operative in another State. I do not know whether that is so or not, having regard to the various steps we have already taken to facilitate procedure by making the orders and judgments of one State operative and enforceable in another. But that is a question of procedure; it has nothing whatever to do with the operation of the common law, and this clause does not touch it at all. It is a declaration which seems to me to suggest a blemish on what we hope will be an exceedingly good Bill. We are, in this clause, making a declaration which will stamp us as forgetful of the ordinary principles of the law, and as practically noodles — a declaration, not regulating any procedure, as that might be done in another way, but that the common law of England applies, unless altered by the laws of the Commonwealth. Of course, that is so. We brought here the common law of England when Australia and every State of it was founded. That common law applies throughout every inch of our territory, whether within a State or within the ambit of the Commonwealth. It remains until we alter it. We can alter the common law as applicable to Australia, but until we do so it remains in force. It is of no use to deal with this Bill from the point of view of trying to be critical, and I do not propose to deal with it in that way. I have not examined the Acts relating to execution and process, and the enforcement of judgments. There is Commonwealth and State legislation on that subject; but the introduction of a provision of this kind is, I think, without precedent. I doubt whether my honorable and learned friend can mention any Act which this Parliament has passed, in which it is stated that the common law of England shall apply unless altered by our legislation. It does apply.

Senator KEATING. — It might not apply throughout the Commonwealth, because there might be State legislation on the subject.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — But all such State legislation on the subject comes to an end immediately we pass this Bill. That is the object of it. State legislation and Commonwealth legislation on the same subject cannot stand together.

Senator KEATING. — I beg the honorable and learned senator's pardon.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Surely my honorable and learned friend understands his own Bill?

Senator KEATING. — Yes, I do.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — This is a Bill to give effect to our powers, as the Parliament of the Commonwealth, to legislate on the subject of copyright, and the moment it becomes law away goes all State legislation on the subject, except as regards existing rights, which, of course, are protected, as they should be. It would be a distinct blemish on this Bill to provide that the common law of England shall apply when we know that it does, except where we alter it. As to procedure, I say nothing, because that is another matter. But that the common law is the same here as in South Australia, and will be the same after the passing of this Bill, is absolutely undoubted, and we should not by the insertion of such a provision throw any doubt on the subject.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I pointed out, during the course of the honorable and learned senator's remarks, that in the absence of this provision, the common law of England need not necessarily apply in regard to unpublished literary manuscript throughout all the States.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — It must apply.

Senator KEATING.—It may have been varied by existing State legislation.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That State legislation comes to an end entirely when we pass this Bill.

Senator KEATING.—I differ entirely from the honorable and learned senator on that point.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Will Senator Keating look at clause 8?

Senator KEATING.—The next clause deals only with the question of copyright, and at the beginning of my remarks, in opposing the suggestion that we should strike out this provision, I pointed out that the subject of unpublished literary manuscript in its entirety is cognate to that of copyright, rather than a subject wholly within the domain of copyright in the truest and strictest interpretation of that term.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is not copyright at all.

Senator KEATING.—It is not, but it is an adjunct, so to speak, of copyright, and precedes it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is not an adjunct; an unpublished manuscript is a man's own property.

Senator KEATING.—I put it in this way: that the law with regard to unpublished literary manuscript has a distinct relation to copyright. The preparation of the manuscript necessarily precedes publication, and the law regarding manuscript is necessarily connected with that of copyright being antecedent to it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—A manuscript is a man's own property as much as is his table or his chair.

Senator KEATING.—Exactly. There are peculiar characteristics with regard to manuscript to which I have already referred, which do not apply to a copyright. I have shown that it does not pass to a trustee in bankruptcy, and that its assignment does not carry with it the right to publish.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is all by law. We do not alter that.

Senator KEATING.—We do not alter it, but in the absence of this provision with regard to unpublished literary manuscript, we should leave the law with regard to the publication of manuscript still within the domain and the province of the several States. They may still legislate on the subject, and different laws dealing with it may be passed by different States. In such a case a person who would get a copyright under this Bill in one State would perhaps start under disadvantages as compared with another person starting from a different point in another State. So we propose to make it plain and explicit that, subject to this, and any other Acts of this Parliament, the common law of England, with regard to unpublished literary manuscript shall remain in force and effect throughout the Commonwealth. With regard to procedure, I again repeat that when we make this matter the subject of Commonwealth legislation, with which the States cannot hereafter interfere, we provide for uniform procedure throughout the Commonwealth.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We cannot provide for procedure in this Bill.

Senator KEATING.—We can make a basis for it when we legislate on the subject in this Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We are not legislating on this subject. Fancy legislation on the subject of the ownership of a piece of paper!

Senator KEATING.—The honorable and learned senator will not deny this proposition: That if we leave this clause out it will remain within the province of every one of the States to place on the statute-book specific and varying legislation with regard to the subject of unpublished literary manuscript.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We cannot touch it in this Bill any more than we can deal with the ownership of a table or a chair.

Senator KEATING.—I think we can.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable and learned senator will find it difficult to give his authority.

Senator KEATING.—We can provide in this Bill, which deals with copyright, that the common law of England with regard to it in any particular shall remain in force, subject to this and any other Act of this Parliament, throughout the whole of the Commonwealth; and if we do so, we shall have taken from the States for all time the jurisdiction to deal with that particular subject of legislation. It must be remembered that in these matters the States have concurrent jurisdiction with the Commonwealth.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Commonwealth has no jurisdiction in regard to that subject at all.

Senator KEATING.—I submit that it has.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Where do we get it?

Senator KEATING.—We have it as something incidental to the execution of our powers of jurisdiction in the matter of copyright.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But it is not copyright.

Senator KEATING.—I am certain that we have jurisdiction in regard to this matter. I again point out that, construing the term copyright in its strictest and most rigid sense, this is a matter which does not wholly and entirely come within copyright law, as it has been and always must be dealt with in connexion with copyright law.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No, it has not. A reference to it in a copyright law does not prove that it can be dealt with under a power to enact copyright law.

Senator KEATING.—I will ask my honorable and learned friend if he can refer me to any extended treatise on the law relating to unpublished literary manuscript which is not found in a text-book dealing with the law of copyright. This has always been considered as an adjunct of the law of copyright, just as have the questions of a performing right, and other rights which have grown up from time to time. I think it is desirable to provide that the law in regard to unpublished literary manuscripts so far as they may found copyrights shall subject to our legislation be uniform throughout the Commonwealth, and not to leave it to the States to legislate in the future on this subject divergently, and so to a very great extent nullify at its very source the advantages of uniformity that we are trying to insure for those who will get copyright under this Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I am afraid that we are going to make a fiasco of the Bill at the very outset. When I pointed out that the common law of England applies throughout the whole of the Commonwealth—that every State, with every person therein, is covered and clothed with the common law of England, unless it has been altered by Statute—my honorable friend questioned that statement; but I think he now admits its truth.

Senator KEATING.—I say that the common law does not apply throughout the Commonwealth as one area.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Are we to cut it up into bits? As the whole is made up of its different parts, I should say, without any refining or hair-splitting, that the common law applies throughout the whole.

Senator KEATING.—A man would have to take six remedies to get redress.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is procedure. I think every honorable senator, whether lawyer or layman, must understand the elementary principle that the common law applies throughout Australia, and that until it is altered we must abide by it. But now my honorable and learned friend says that an unpublished manuscript may be dealt with by any State under its ordinary law of property. Undoubtedly that is so. But an unpublished manuscript has nothing to do with the question of copyright. An unpublished manuscript of mine is just as much my property as my purse or penknife, or table, or chair. It only comes under the influence of copyright when it is published. This Bill defines what publication is, and provides that copyright shall only subsist from the time of publication. If that is the case, an unpublished manuscript is not subject to the law of copyright. My letter or manuscript is just as much my property as any other article which belongs to me, and of course as a subject of legislation it is within the ambit of the States. The clause is objectionable as a blemish on the Bill, because it declares that to be the law by virtue of a Statute, which is the law by virtue of our being part of the British Dominions. If the Bill is to deal with unpublished manuscripts, and we are to pass a provision which is to apply throughout all the States, and to supersede the State law in relation to unpublished documents, we are doing something which we have not power to do. Our only power of legislation on this subject is as to copyrights. We have no power to enact that a document which belongs to me in South Australia shall or shall not be my property. The Commonwealth is not empowered to say that my unpublished literary work shall not be my property, or shall be dealt with by some other law than that of the State of which I am a citizen. If Senator Keating could show that the unpublished letters of a man are not his own property as much as are his goods and chattels, then there would be some force in that part of his argument. When we look at what our powers are, inasmuch as copyright only begins to operate on publication, everything antecedent to publication is private property. That point has been settled over and over again. In South Australia the other day an action was brought to restrain a soda-water manufacturer from using a recipe surreptitiously taken from a manuscript book by an employé of another soda-water manufacturer. An injunction was granted, and damages were awarded. An account had to be kept, and the former had to pay up the profits he had made, if they could be ascertained, on the ground that the manuscript book was the private property of its owner, just as much as his chairs and bottles, and that the copying of the recipe by his employé, and handing the copy over to another person, was literally theft. On the other hand, I can give an illustration of a case of copyright which is a totally different thing. The late Mr. Gladstone published a book which was called The Bulgarian Horrors, or the Question of the East. Instructed by Mr. Gladstone, I appeared in the Supreme Court of the State, and got an injunction against certain publishers in Adelaide, because the property of copyright attached to the book. We are legislating as to one class, the authors of such books. We are not legislating, and have no power to legislate, as to the other class represented by the owner of the unpublished book containing the recipe for making sodawater. If we leave this clause in the Bill we shall go beyond our power, if it is for the purpose mentioned by Senator Keating. If, on the other hand, it is not for that purpose, we are asserting a position which is undoubted.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—So far from the clause being possibly a blot on our legislation, I would say to honorable senators that if it be omitted we shall have a very serious gap in the Bill. I am well aware that, with regard to the question of the ownership and disposal of property, whether it be a table or a chair, or an unpublished literary manuscript, the States will still have the full measure of legislative jurisdiction which they have hitherto enjoyed. But once an unpublished literary manuscript gets out of the hands of the author, he has a power to restrain the publication of it without his authority. But how must he exercise that power? If an author invoked the jurisdiction of a Victorian Court, and obtained an injunction to restrain the publication of his manuscript—and bear in mind that, under this Bill, the moment it is published a copyright will subsist in it for some one—the publisher might go to another State, snap his fingers at the injunction, and publish the manuscript again. It would be necessary for the author to follow him from State to State, and invoke the jurisdiction of a competent tribunal in each.

Senator BEST.—Could he not go to the Federal Court?

Senator KEATING.—The author and the publisher may be the citizens of one State. Senator Symon said that the common law of England operates throughout the Commonwealth. His argument was that the effect of an injunction in one State would be to restrain the person enjoined from publishing anywhere throughout the Commonwealth.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — I never said so.

Senator KEATING. — The honorable and learned senator said that the common law of England applied throughout the Commonwealth as one area.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The other is procedure; not the common law.

Senator KEATING.—I said the common law of England does not apply throughout the Commonwealth as throughout one area, but it applies throughout the six different States.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Surely the honorable and learned senator, as a lawyer, does not seriously state that proposition?

Senator KEATING. — In the second edition of his Australian Constitutional Law, Mr. Justice Clark, at page 192, has this passage on the Constitution of the Commonwealth and the common law—

But as the supreme depository of Executive authority in the Commonwealth, the Crown possesses prerogative rights and powers which have their source in the common law. It is therefore evident that a portion of the common law attaches to the Constitution of the Commonwealth. But, except in relation to the Executive powers of the Crown, it is submitted that there cannot be any Federal common law in Australia, and that the Federal Courts of the Commonwealth will not possess any jurisdiction under the common law.

So that without this provision there would be no court of competent jurisdiction in Australia except State Courts to preserve to the author of an unpublished literary manuscript his common law rights against others imperilling his copyright, and the State Court could only give redress within its ambit.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—This clause will not give any more common law jurisdiction to the High Court than it had before.

Senator KEATING.—So far as unpublished literary manuscripts may be affected by the law of copyright—and they may be affected by publication unauthorizedly—we provide in this clause that, subject to this or any other measure we may pass, the common law of England shall apply throughout the Commonwealth as one area. The common law in this detail is made the statute law of the Commonwealth, and the Federal Courts will then have a Federal jurisdiction in relation to the rights which are perpetuated by the Bill, from which we prevent the different States hereafter from making divergence by their own legislation. If we leave the matter to the States it is quite possible that hereafter some of them might legislate so that persons starting off to acquire copyright by publishing previously unpublished manuscripts, would be on different levels.

Senator PEARCE.—That would be only in case of publication.

Senator KEATING.—Copyright would only arise after publication. We want to make the present English common law Federal common law.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We cannot do it.

Senator KEATING.—We can, and we are doing it by this Bill in such a way that the different States will not be able to legislate upon this particular branch of the subject in its relation to copyright.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—They could legislate in regard to unpublished manuscripts.

Senator KEATING.—I am not dealing with ownership, but with the question of publication. It is when a literary manuscript is first published that the law of copyright applies to it. It may be authorizedly, or unauthorizedly published. If it is unauthorizedly published, and we have no legislation of this kind, the person whose rights are infringed may have to seek the intervention of half-a-dozen different States Courts. We want to obviate the necessity of his having to hunt round from State to State after some one who has published his manuscript. We want to give our Federal Courts jurisdiction. But the Federal Court as a Federal Court cannot exercise any common law jurisdiction. The jurisdiction must be conferred upon it by the statutes of the Commonwealth. Much as my honorable friend Senator Symon may smile at the assertion, I feel confident that if we do not insert this provision in the Bill, we shall be guilty of a very serious omission which might interfere with the rights of authors. We are providing, therefore, that whatever on this point exists in Great Britain as common law—and which exists so far as I know in each of the States separately—shall be statute law throughout the Commonwealth, and that our Federal Courts shall have jurisdiction in such matter as being a matter of Federal statute law.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I will tell the Committee in a sentence or two what the point is from which my honorable and learned friend Senator Keating, as I think, diverged very greatly. He says that it is necessary to pass this clause in order to give the Federal Courts jurisdiction. All that I can say is that he will not give the Federal Courts jurisdiction in any shape or form by this clause. If they had no jurisdiction before, they will have none after we have passed the clause. We are dealing with proprietary rights in unpublished literary compositions. The term "proprietary rights" is simply a large expression for ownership. We mean the ownership of unpublished literary compositions just as we might refer to the ownership of goods and chattels or of tables and chairs. This clause says that the common law of England relating to proprietary rights in unpublished literary compositions, shall apply throughout the Commonwealth. The common law which exists in Australia is the common law of England. That being the case, what is the power in Australia that deals with the ownership of private property? The States. That power has not been taken from them. They have power to tax unpublished literary manuscripts just as they have power to tax anything else. My honorable friend says that the object of this clause is to take that right right away from them. Suppose a State has passed an Act which says that the ownership of an unpublished manuscript shall be in some one else than the author. It has a perfect right to legislate in that manner. We have no power to take that right away. Our only power is to deal with copyright which affects publication authorized by the owner of the manuscript. If a manuscript is published without the authority of the owner, he does not lose his control over it. He has an absolute right to stop the publication; just as the person from whose private book a recipe was copied by some one who had no right to it, was enabled to obtain protection and damages. If this clause would assist authors in any way whatever, I should not say a word against it. But we have no power whatever to take away the right of a State to legislate with regard to an unpublished manuscript. The matter is beyond our jurisdiction. Any lawyer would agree that the common law of England affecting private property applies here unless altered by Statute.

Question—That the clause stand as printed—put. The Committee divided.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8—

1. The State Copyright Acts shall not apply to any book, dramatic or musical work, lecture, or artistic work in which copyright, performing right, or lecturing right, subsists under this Act.

2. Subject to Part II of this Act, nothing in this Act shall affect the application of the laws in force in any State at the commencement of this Act to any copyright or other right in relation to books or dramatic or musical works or lectures, or artistic or fine art works acquired under or protected by those laws before the commencement of this Act.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Immediately this Bill becomes law the States laws, of course, will be superseded.

Senator KEATING.—So far as copyright is concerned, but some of the States laws deal with other matters also.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Subject, of course, to the protection of existing secured rights. The intention of the first sub-clause is fairly plain—that is, it is to abrogate the effect of States Copyright Acts.

Senator GIVENS.—The Constitution does that.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is not intended that the States Acts shall remain in force, or be administered, except in regard to rights that are safeguarded; but the language of sub-clause 1 of clause 8 might leave it to be inferred that the States Acts remain in force, though they shall not apply to any book as to which copyright subsists under this Bill. With a view to removing that objection, I move—

That sub-clause 1 be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the following:—“(1) After the passing of this Act no copyright shall be acquired, or be capable of being acquired, under or by virtue of any State Act.”

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I am not in a position to say that I can accept the amendment, even on the assurance that it will achieve exactly the same object as that which the sub-clause as it stands seeks to effect. When moving the second reading of the Bill, I particularly referred to clauses 8 and 12, and pointed out that some representations had been made by Mr. Anderson, of the Public Library, Sydney, to the Premier of New South Wales, to the effect that this Bill would in some way derogate from the rights of that State and that institution. In order that there should be no possible idea in the mind of any person that it is intended to override any rights which the States are entitled to enjoy, I announced that I intended to submit amendments in both the clauses that I have mentioned. Those amendments have been in circulation for some days; and I do not think that Senator Symon ought now to ask me to accept a new sub-clause, which none of us but himself and the Clerk have seen. Senator Symon must surely realize that I cannot accept such an amendment at the table, but that I must have some time for consideration, and, possibly, consultation with those who have assisted me in drafting the Bill. What it is desired to effect will be properly effected by the sub-clause as it stands, together with the amendment of which I have given notice.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I quite respond to what Senator Keating has said as to my calling on him to choose between the two. If the honorable senator does not see his way to accept the amendment, I shall not press it to a division. I took a division before on a very important clause, and the result guides me to the course I should adopt in regard to any other amendments. Much as I am anxious to assist the Minister, I should not be disposed to press amendments in a Bill of this kind, the responsibility for which rests entirely with the Government. My desire is to assist the Government; but if honorable senators think that because an amendment emanates from this side it ought to be immediately rejected, I shall not put them to the trouble to divide.

Senator KEATING.—I do not suggest that.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Honorable senators opposite were, many of them, not present during the debate. I am willing to accept the situation, because the responsibility rests with the Government; and those who sit behind the Government are perfectly entitled to vote in accordance with what the Government desire, and to share that responsibility. However, Senator Keating will have an opportunity to consider the amendment that I have moved, the object of which is practically to give effect to the provision of the Constitution that this Bill, if it becomes law, shall supersede existing States legislation. The Constitution operates quite irrespective of any provision of this kind in the Bill, but it is a simple way of declaring that no copyright shall be acquired under any State Act after this Bill comes into operation.

Senator FRASER.—Would not this Bill effect that object without a clause of the kind?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes, but it is just as well to have a declaration on the face of the measure. In substance this Bill was in existence under the auspices of the late Government, though it had not then been revised. It is quite obvious that the words of the sub-clause as it stands imply that as to books, dramatic works, lectures, or artistic work, if there are any, in which copyright does not subsist under the Bill, the States Acts are still to remain in force. The sub-clause implies that there are some kinds of copyright or productions to which copyright may attach under a State Act after we have legislated.

Senator MILLEN.—An author might have a choice.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That might be so, and the sub-clause will tend to litigation if it be left obscure, as it is at present. What it is intended to declare is that no copyright shall be acquired under any State law after this Bill comes into operation. The amendment appears to me to be a great and distinct improvement, which will remove all obscurity and prevent possible litigation and doubt—certainly doubt, if not litigation. What we all desire to do is to revise and polish our Bills so as to make them perfectly clear.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—Will Senator Keating explain in what way a State Copyright Act could apply to any books, performing rights, lectures, or artistic work registered under this Bill?

Senator GUTHRIE.—The clause says, "subsists," not "registered."

Senator BEST.—Both words mean practically the same thing.

Senator KEATING.—There is a great deal of difference between a subsisting copyright and a copyright acquired by registration.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Registration is merely evidence of the copyright.

Senator KEATING.—No.

Senator BEST.—I agree with Senator Symon that the clause as it stands seems to create a degree of embarrassment. It indicates that some rights exist in regard to books, either registered under or governed by the Bill; and the fact that the Constitution itself provides that Commonwealth legislation shall prevail, increases the embarrassment. It is desirable that there should be some declaration in the form suggested by Senator Symon. I do not mean to say that a declaration is absolutely necessary, but if we are to have one, it ought to be of a definite character, and not the hybrid provision now presented.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—In reply to Senator Best, I point out that the sub-clause deals only with books, dramatic and musical works, lectures, and artistic work in which copyright “subsists” under the Bill. The principle of the Bill is that copyright, lecturing right, performing right, and other rights of that character subsist in every individual instance in which the publication, first performance, or first delivery has taken place in Australia, or when such first performance, or delivery and so forth, has taken place simultaneously in Australia with the first performance or delivery elsewhere. The rights enure in those instances by virtue of the fact that the first performance or publication takes place here, and then the right “subsists under this Act.” In such cases no registration is necessary. The only case in which it is necessary to register is where a man has so acquired a copyright or performing right, and wishes to sue; then he must register before he takes action.

Senator BEST. — How can a State law apply?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—A State law cannot apply.

Senator KEATING. — Does Senator Symon say that a State law cannot apply?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Certainly not to a Commonwealth copyright.

Senator KEATING.—Well, let us see. In some of the States Acts there is a similar provision that copyright shall subsist, for instance, in a book first published in the State. That law is in force in those States at the present time, and we provide here in this Bill that copyright shall subsist throughout the Commonwealth in a book first published in Australia. The point might be raised whether, in the case of a copyright subsisting under a State law, prior to Federal legislation, by virtue of first publication in the State, the State law would continue to operate in regard to a book published in that State subsequently to the passing of the Bill, as well as the Commonwealth law.

Senator BEST.—That would be a most undesirable state of affairs.

Senator KEATING. — This Bill is an endeavour to provide against such a state of affairs.

Senator BEST.—But the Bill only goes half-way.

Senator KEATING.—We are providing that States Copyrights Acts shall not apply to any book, dramatic work, and so forth, in which copyright “subsists under this Act.” It is provided that when a book is published in Australia, copyright subsists under this Bill, and then the States Copyright Acts that are in force now, and which, to some extent, may be in force hereafter in the particular State in which a book is first published, shall not operate to give any rights in that State in addition to the rights given by the Commonwealth legislation. I do not know yet the exact wording of the amendment suggested or how far it will meet the case.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable and learned senator will find that it meets the very point to which he has been referring.

Senator KEATING.—I think that Ministers and honorable senators generally might have been given a better opportunity of considering an amendment of this character than is afforded by the procedure adopted. Senator Symon proposes to provide that—

After the passing of this Act no copyright shall be acquired, or be capable of being acquired, under or by virtue of any State Act.

In Tasmania, we have a Patents, Trade Marks, and Industrial Designs Act, and there is provision made in that Act for acquiring copyright in industrial designs. There is provision made in similar Acts in other States for acquiring copyright in industrial designs. In some of the States the main Copyright Act, apart from the State Patents Act, makes provision for a limited term of copyright in industrial designs. This Bill has no reference to industrial designs, therefore, if we pass this amendment we shall provide that, after the passing of this Bill, no copyright in designs shall be acquired or be capable of being acquired under or by virtue of any of those State Acts.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The other words must be read into the amendment, of course.

Senator KEATING.—That is only one instance which occurs to my mind, and the amendment, if agreed to as it stands, would leave us with a Copyright Bill dealing with certain subjects, and would provide that hereafter no copyright could be acquired in industrial designs. If the amendment had been circulated earlier it is probable that other objections might have suggested themselves.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Why not postpone the clause?

Senator KEATING.—We might have been given an opportunity for further consideration of the amendment.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable and learned senator will not take the opportunity.

Senator KEATING.—If the honorable and learned senator is very desirous of pressing his amendment, which, after all, is one of form, and not of principle, and which the honorable and learned senator admits is intended to effect the same object which the clause purports to effect, and which, in my opinion, it does effect, I shall have no objection to postpone the consideration of the clause until after we have dealt with other clauses. It is obvious that the honorable and learned senator has overlooked the matter of industrial designs, and possibly there may be other objections to his amendment.

Clause 9—

1. There shall be a Registrar of Copyrights.
2. The Governor-General may appoint a Deputy-Registrar of Copyrights, who shall, subject to the control of the Registrar of Copyrights, have all the powers conferred by this Act on the Registrar.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I suggest that it might be well to give the Governor-General power to appoint one or more Deputy-Registrars of Copyright. It might be found desirable to appoint a Deputy-Registrar of Copyright in each State. I suggest that after the word "appoint" the words "one or more" should be inserted.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I point out that the clause, as it stands, effects the honorable and learned senator's object, because the Acts Interpretation Act provides that the singular shall be taken to denote the plural.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I am obliged to the honorable and learned senator for referring me to that Act. The provision referred to merely implies that even where the singular was used in certain instances the Governor-General might appoint several, and not that he could appoint one or more; that is to say, one in one State and one in another.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—Surely Senator Keating does not mean to construe the Acts Interpretation Act so as to suggest that a power given to appoint one officer involves a power given to appoint more. Would the honorable and learned senator say that a power to appoint a High Commissioner would be a power to appoint a dozen High Commissioners? I suggest that the common-sense reading of the provision is that where we confer the power to appoint one specified officer, that power cannot be exceeded. Senator Keating's answer to Senator Symon shows that the honorable and learned senator has considered the matter, because he contends that the clause provides for the appointment of more than one deputy registrar. I have not much doubt myself as to whether it does, but if there is a doubt it is desirable that it should be made clear. I move—

That the word "a," line 2, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "one or more."

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I think that Senator Keating will do well to accept the amendment. I do not read the Acts Interpretation Act as meaning that the singular denotes the plural in a case of this sort. Senator Millen has shown that the result of such a construction of the Act might be disastrous. I think that Senator Keating will have some difficulty in showing that in this instance the singular denotes the plural.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I think the clause as it stands provides for what Senator Symon desires. It provides that the Governor-General may appoint a deputy registrar, and I think that includes more than one deputy registrar if the appointment of more than one is found to be desirable. With regard to the suggestion made by Senators Millen and Dobson that this interpretation would lead to very undesirable results, I point out that the Acts Interpretation Act provides that—

In any Act, unless the contrary intention appears, words in the singular shall include the plural.

If we are to pass a High Commissioner Bill I can assure honorable senators that if the Bill is brought down by the present Government the contrary intention will very clearly appear in it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—So it does in this Bill. "A" means "one."

Senator KEATING.—“A” is singular, and “one” is singular.

Senator MILLEN.—Could the Governor-General appoint more than one registrar?

Senator KEATING.—He might, unless the contrary intention appears in the Bill. The Bill provides that there shall be a deputy-registrar of copyrights, and I contend that the Governor-General might appoint a deputy-registrar of copyrights in each State. However, I have no objection to the amendment, though I think the clause as it stands is clear enough.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Copyright Office).

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—As I have been somewhat alarmed by the Minister's statement as to the wide powers which may probably be given under the previous clause by a certain reading of the Acts Interpretation Act, I should like to have the honorable and learned senator's assurance that the singular is not intended to denote the plural here, and that we shall have but one Commonwealth Copyright Office, and not several.

Senator KEATING.—I think the intention is clearly indicated in this clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clause 12—

The Governor-General may, by proclamation, declare that, from and after a date specified in the proclamation, the administration of the State Copyright Acts of any State shall be transferred to the Commonwealth and thereupon—

- (a) the State Copyright Acts of the State shall, so far as they have any relation to copyrights, cease to be administered by the State, and shall thereafter be administered by the Commonwealth so far as is necessary for the purpose of completing then pending proceedings and of giving effect to then existing rights, and the Registrar shall collect for the State all fees which become payable thereunder; and

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I move in accordance with notice—

That after the words “of any State,” line 4, the following words be inserted—“so far as they relate to the registration of the copyright in any book, the performing right in any musical or dramatic work, the lecturing right in any lecture, and the copyright in any artistic or fine art work, or to the registration of any assignment or grant of, or licence in relation to, any such right.”

The object of the amendment is to make it abundantly clear that we only endeavour to transfer the administration of States

Copyright Acts in so far as they relate to the subject of copyright, performing right, lecturing right, and the registration or assignment, or the licensing of any such right. Honorable senators will remember that previously I made reference to some criticisms levelled at the Bill by the Librarian of the Sydney Public Library. The Copyright Act of New South Wales provides, amongst other things, that a copy of every publication issued in the State shall be supplied to that institution, and also, I believe, to the Sydney University. In conformity with that provision, the former is supplied with about 340 newspapers, and is thereby enabled to keep records which hereafter may be of very great value and interest. I do not know that the Bill as it stands would in any way interfere with the right of the institution to get these publications, because our legislation would not be inconsistent with, or repugnant to, the State law upon the point. But if it were, it would still be competent for the State Parliament, apart from the question of copyright, to require the publishers of a work in New South Wales to supply a copy thereof to certain institutions. But in order that it might be made abundantly clear on the face of this Bill that it was not intended to interfere with such existing rights, I gave notice of my intention to move certain amendments in this clause. I may mention again that this matter was first brought under my notice by the Librarian of the Melbourne Public Library. He has seen these amendments, and thinks that, so far as that institution is concerned, they are eminently satisfactory, and meet the case.

Senator MILLEN. — Can he justify the levying of this tribute on authors and publishers?

Senator KEATING.—This tribute, if the expression may be used, is levied, not as a condition precedent to the acquisition of copyright, but pursuant to the legislation of the State. The provision happens to be contained in its Copyright Act. I do not think that all the publications of which these libraries get copies are copyrighted. If this measure be passed, we could not prevent a State from imposing upon a printer or publisher within its jurisdiction the necessity of providing certain institutions with a copy of his publications. It is provided in clause 74 of this Bill that any applicant for the registration of the copyright in a book shall deliver to the Registrar two copies of it—one to be forwarded by him to the Librarian of the Commonwealth Parliament, and the other to be retained by him until otherwise prescribed. At the present time, in order to get copyright in Victoria, New South Wales, and Western Australia, an applicant has to deposit one book or more in each State. I cannot say from memory exactly how many books have to be deposited in order to get copyright in the United Kingdom; but not very long ago as many as eleven or twelve libraries, including the British Museum and certain Universities, had to be supplied with from five to nine copies each.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I had anticipated that the Minister would have ventured to justify the idea of levying tribute upon those who may seek to get the benefit of this measure.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Yes, but we do not wish to interfere with a State Act.

Senator MILLEN.—There is no particular compulsion upon us to affirm that we approve of the provision in the State Act, or wish to continue it.

Senator GUTHRIE.—We do not wish to take the right away from the States.

Senator MILLEN.—The Minister wishes to continue the right to the States.

Senator KEATING.—No. I do not think if we passed the Bill as it stands we should deprive the States of it. I said that this amendment was only introduced for the sake of more abundant certainty.

Senator MILLEN.—I entirely differ from the honorable and learned senator. It seems to me to approach the height of meanness to attempt to levy this tribute upon the authors of books or publishers of newspapers. In a circular, which he has addressed to honorable senators, Mr. Anderson, of the Sydney Public Library, has pointed out that these newspapers and other documents become valuable. If they become valuable, let the public who use the institution pay for them. I can quite understand any one arguing that, inasmuch as a Copyright Act would confer a considerable advantage upon an author, therefore he might reasonably be asked to pay for it. Let us openly charge an author a fee for the benefit we propose to confer upon him. But after we have granted copyright to a man, do not let us turn round and insist upon him contributing to an institution a copy of his book, or of his newspaper. This appears to me to be a species of loafing. I cannot conceive that in private business we would attempt to justify such a proceeding. It is a little worse than a secret commission, because we are taking something by arbitrary authority, which I do not think we can justify. Let me point out how unfairly this tribute is imposed. Let us compare the case of a man who has published a remarkably valuable book with the case of a man who has published a book which can be purchased for sixpence. Here the tribute is not equitably levied. If a contribution is to be exacted from an author, as a return for the protection he gets, let it be exacted in proportion to the value of his work. This tribute must be a heavy tax upon an author who has published a limited number of copies of an expensive book. Where a man has published a sixpenny edition of a work he is really not taxed when he is asked to supply a copy to certain institutions. For that reason, I am extremely disappointed that the Minister has not made it clear to me, if he has to others, that there is some justice underlying the law which is said to exist in New South Wales, and which I affirm he is seeking to perpetuate.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I am compelled to disagree somewhat with the remarks made by Senator Millen. I must have a little sympathy with Senator Keating for having brought in amendments specially to oblige the Librarian of the Sydney Public Library. The Premier of New South Wales has sent to all the members of the Senate, I believe, certainly to all the senators from that State, a statement on the subject. Therefore, it seemed to me that it did not require very much explanation when the Minister did not elaborate his reasons for agreeing to the amendments suggested. It is said by Mr. Anderson that 340 newspapers are published in New South Wales, and that a copy of each newspaper, free of cost, is deposited week by week with the Sydney Public Library. The cost to the newspaper publishers is as near nothing as possible, because the postage rate amounts to about 1d. per dozen. Every newspaper has a number of advertising clients in the metropolis, and has to send down a bundle of newspapers, so that the postage is really trifling. It would be a tax, however, if the Sydney Public Library were called upon to subscribe for a copy of each one of these newspapers. If it was called upon to make a special contribution, the trustees would have to consider whether, after all, it was worth while to spend £500 or £600 a year for the sake of completing these files. I very much doubt that it would be. But as the newspapers can be obtained at the very minimum of expense to the printers, and will be available for reference in coming years, we should maintain the existing rights of the Public Library. I think that the Minister has only done what is right in recognising the representations of its librarian. Therefore, I trust that Senator Millen will see his way to withdraw his objection.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I am very pleased that Senator Pulsford has spoken as he has done. I regret that Senator Millen does not see that, in some cases, it is a decided advantage to an author that his work can be consulted in the Public Library at Sydney or Melbourne, and that it may thereby gain public appreciation. Unfortunately, there is a great feeling abroad in Sydney that the Federal Parliament, somehow or other, is unnecessarily treading upon the toes of the State. In this case, we would do well, I think, to refrain from accentuating that feeling.

Senator MILLEN.—To please Mr. Anderson?

Senator WALKER.—No, to please the people of New South Wales. My honorable friend is at liberty to go to the Sydney Public Library, and see all these books and newspapers. The Premier of New South Wales has spoken on behalf of the State, and its representatives, as loyal New South Welshmen, ought, I think, to support him.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—It is with very mingled feelings of pain and pleasure that I find myself in the position of being obliged to support the views of Senator Millen. Whilst I quite sympathize with what Senator Walker has said about the undesirability of this Parliament treading upon the toes of the States, I do not like to see the States treading upon the toes of authors in this very indiscriminate and severe fashion. My honorable friend, Senator Millen, alluded to this practice as loafing. I call it a very undesirable form of blackmail. The Government have apparently yielded to the representations of Mr. Anderson, of Sydney, that these libraries should get publications on the cheap. If public libraries are to have copies of all works published, and if the object be to help an author to gain public appreciation, why not private libraries also?

Senator GUTHRIE.—That is the only way in which some authors could get their books read!

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What we are asked to do is to give legislative recognition by the Commonwealth to a practice which it is perhaps quite true the States may be able to enforce in some other way; but the odium ought to be placed upon the States of enforcing a tax of this character on literature. We already insure that an author on securing copyright shall present two copies of his work, one of which goes to the Library of the Federal Parliament. That is a proper thing, because it is a record of the copyright. But it is very different to impose a tax of this kind upon authors, independently of copyright. I do not believe that any State Parliament would consent to pass a law imposing such a tax upon authors. There is no more reason why New South Wales should have two or more copies of a book published in that State than that any other library in the Commonwealth should be similarly treated; except that these people have been getting their books for nothing in the past, and want to get them for nothing in the future. It will be observed that the requirement is that not only shall the author be compelled to present his book in the ordinary binding, just as it may be sold in any shop; he has to present copies "printed upon the best paper upon which the same shall be printed." In these days there are éditions de luxe of many books. Copies are printed on hand-made paper. These people wish to exact the finest library copies of an unfortunate author's book. If he happens to print for circulation among his friends a few copies at a higher price than the ordinary copies, he has to present one of the special copies to the New South Wales library. It may be worth 8 or 10 guineas.

Senator PEARCE.—Would the author have to present copies in each State in which there was copyright?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No; the moment the copyright law of the Commonwealth comes into force there is no longer any State copyright. Publication in New South Wales is publication in the Commonwealth. But these people in New South Wales want to retain the right of exacting copies of books published in that State for their libraries.

Senator PEARCE.—We have a similar provision in Western Australia; will not an author have to give a copy of his book to the library there?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—He will have to give copies such as he is directed to give under this Bill, just as in England to secure copyright copies of a book have to be handed to certain libraries. To compel authors to give copies to State libraries, as proposed, is simply a pure, unadulterated piece of literary blackmail. I suggest the withdrawal of the amendment, because if the clause is sufficient without it there is no need for it. If the Parliament of New South Wales favours this nefarious proceeding, and chooses to exact a direct tax, let it have the odium of doing so. But we should set our faces against such a system. These great libraries should pay for their books if they want them, and are not entitled to get any help at our hands.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I should like to point out that for one book published in an expensive form such as we have heard about, there are other books by the hundred, and there are newspapers by the thousand. That is the main point. I recently published a little pamphlet, and within the last few days have had a few copies bound with strong backs especially to present them to three or four libraries. I gave one to the Public Library in Sydney, and another to the Parliamentary Library here. I am glad at any time for these public libraries to have copies of anything that I bring out. I do not think that Senator Symon himself, if he published anything, would be other than delighted to present copies to the leading libraries.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I always do; but let it be done voluntarily.

Senator PULSFORD.—I say again that for one costly book there are thousands of newspapers and other publications. The intention is principally to obtain copies of newspapers.

Senator MILLEN.—Is it less a tax because it is small?

Senator PULSFORD.—It is scarcely worth calling a tax and it is a fair and reasonable thing to do.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland). — I share the view taken by Senator Millen and Senator Symon. It is not part of the duty of this Parliament to give facilities for any State Government to do what is unfair and unjust.

Senator PULSFORD.—It is not the duty of the Senate to abridge State rights.

Senator GIVENS.—We are not proposing to abridge State rights in any way. The people of the Commonwealth gave us power to legislate with regard to copyright, and I take it that they did not expect us to have special regard to the desires of the libraries of any State. In my opinion, an author should not be subjected to a tax simply because he has to take advantage of the law of the land to define and protect his rights. Why should we with the one hand give an author the protection of copyright so as to protect the products of his own brain, whilst at the same time we compel him to contribute a portion of his property to some person or State? It does not matter whether the publication is worth a penny or a thousands pounds. It is a question of principle. I would also point out that this Bill affects works of art. Must an artist who reproduces a work of art be compelled to give copies to several State institutions? I am strongly in favour of the establishment of public libraries in every town where there is a reasonable population. But these public libraries should be supported at the public expense, and not at the expense of authors. It is a mere matter of loafing on authors to compel them to contribute copies of their works to Government institutions. One of the most popular Australian authors to-day is at present in financial difficulties. Yet not one of these great public institutions would do a thing to help him, although they have lived upon his brains. By their means his best works have been read by thousands of people, many of whom, if they could not have read them in a free library, would have purchased them. Of course, if the management of a public institution purchase their copies of books, they are entitled to use them as they please, and an author cannot complain that his works are read for nothing by the public. But a public institution is entitled to pay for the books which it acquires, and we should not compel authors to give away works which are the product of their brains, energy, industry, and enterprise.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I cannot see my way to accept the suggestion to withdraw the amendment which, as I indicated before, was drawn up soon after the Bill was circulated, and after representations had been made to me, but before the instance of the New South Wales institutions had been brought under my notice. It seems to me that honorable senators misconceive the situation. We are not endeavouring, by this amendment, to impose any tax on authors. As the Bill stood originally, I did not think that it would deprive public institutions of the right to receive the copies referred to in the clause; but in order that there might be no doubt, this amendment has been submitted. Senator Symon referred to the New South Wales Copyright Act, and spoke in harsh terms of what he seemed to regard as a nefarious proceeding.

Senator MILLEN.—Is it not a nefarious proceeding if carried on, apart from copyright?

Senator KEATING.—There is a provision, almost word for word with this, in the South Australian Copyright Act of 1878, except that it provides that a copy shall be lodged at the South Australia Institute, and, in Western Australia, copies of books and newspapers published in that State have to be sent to the Victoria Public Library in Perth. Then, again, in Victoria, copies of every newspaper or book first printed in that State must be sent to the Public Library, and, perhaps, to other institutions. Honorable senators may be under the impression that if the amendment be carried a man who publishes a book in Australia, will, in order to obtain copyright, have to deposit two copies with the Registrar of Copyrights, and also two copies in each State, as required by the law of each State; but that is not so. The fact is that if a book, for example, be first published in South Australia, two copies will have to be furnished to the Commonwealth Registrar, and a copy to the South Australia Institute, according to the present law of that State.

Senator GUTHRIE.—But supposing there is simultaneous publication in each State?

Senator KEATING.—That is not a question for us.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Minister is making it a question for us by this amendment.

Senator KEATING.—If the South Australia Institute claims a copy of a book on the ground that it is published in that State, and it is objected that the book has been simultaneously published elsewhere, that will be a matter for the two parties to settle under the South Australian State law.

Senator MILLEN.—Then why the amendment?

Senator KEATING.—My amendment will not interfere with the State law in that regard.

Senator MILLEN.—Why submit the amendment if it is not necessary?

Senator KEATING.—I have already explained why I decided to submit the amendment.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Minister is raising a hornet's nest about himself.

Senator KEATING.—I agree with Senator Pulsford that there has been much exaggeration as to the imposition of a "tax," or the levying of "blackmail," and so forth. Under ordinary circumstances, authors are quite prepared to give some such publicity to each of their works. The amendment will mean, in the case of New South Wales, for example, the deposit of an extra two copies, namely, those required for the Registrar under the Bill. In the case of Western Australia, or South Australia, it will only mean an additional copy that will have to be supplied. There are 340 newspapers printed in New South Wales, which are sent to the Sydney Public Library, and such newspapers have been deposited ever since the State law was put in force. These newspapers form a regular and uninterrupted record of great value; indeed, they are the only record available now for the community of New South Wales in regard to certain matters. The same may be said, I believe, of Victoria. It is desirable that there shall be in each of the States a permanent and continuous collection of records of this character; and it must be remembered that this Bill does not provide that newspapers published in any State shall be deposited with the Registrar. In Western Australia, every newspaper published in that State has been filed at the Victoria Library, in Perth, since the Copyright Act was passed; and, as I have pointed out, the same policy has been carried out in New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and, doubtless, in Queensland. In Tasmania there is no provision of the kind, but a copy of every newspaper published in the State must be sent to the Chief Secretary, who keeps the records.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What has the Chief Secretary done that he should be penalized in that way?

Senator KEATING.—I do not know that the Chief Secretary has done anything that he should be penalized. I was told just now by the honorable and learned senator that it was the author who was penalized, though now I am given to understand that it is the recipient. The main object is to preserve the records unbroken.

Senator GIVENS.—At the expense of authors and publishers.

Senator KEATING.—I do not think that Senator Givens can point to a single instance in any of the States where a publisher or author has raised a whisper of a protest.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But under the States laws authors and publishers get copyright in exchange.

Senator KEATING.—This is a matter altogether apart from the question of copyright.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—If no copyright is given in return, say, in New South Wales, this amendment will levy a tax on an author for doing that State the honour of publishing his book there.

Senator KEATING.—I venture to suggest, with all respect, that if those authors and publishers, who are described as being penalized, could hear this debate, they would desire to be saved from their friends. After all, once a work is in print, an extra copy one way or the other matters very little; and these contributions of publications are desirable in the interests of the community. The cost is infinitesimal to the individual, while the results are most valuable to the people at large; and we should do well to let matters stand as at present. No heavy burden is imposed, and each State is provided with records which will prove of great value hereafter.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I cannot appreciate the standard of morality which assumes that an injustice, because it is "only a little one," is in principle less wrong than a big injustice. I have waited for some defence of this amendment, but neither from Senator Pulsford, Senator Walker, nor the Minister have I heard one word to justify the morality of the proposal. Senator Pulsford merely said, as Senator Keating does now, that the charge on those who are compelled to contribute, is infinitesimal. Does that affect the principle? The question is whether this amendment can be justified on the grounds of commercial or any other morality? The second point raised by Senator Keating is that this is the existing law in the several States. But the Minister, if he did not forget—and I can hardly assume he forgot—at any rate omitted to point out that when authors and publishers are required to present copies to public institutions in New South Wales and elsewhere they do so in connexion with the copyrights granted by the several States. The deposit of those copies is incidental to the application for copyright; but in the future a Commonwealth law will secure them that privilege, and while the Bill very properly requires that a couple of copies shall be deposited with the Registrar, I see absolutely no reason why we should continue to enable the States Governments, who will cease to have any power over copyright, to continue to levy this toll on authors and publishers.

Senator PEARCE.—The States have the power to inflict a tax on knowledge if they think fit.

Senator MILLEN.—Then let the States do so directly. I have no desire to pass any law interfering with States rights; indeed, I always fancy myself as being rather stalwart in the defence of States rights. The effect of the amendment is to perpetuate a practice which, in my belief, cannot be justified. Let me put a parallel case to honorable senators. Would honorable senators entertain for a moment a proposition that, in connexion with applications for patents, a duplicate or model of every invention should be lodged at the Patent Office and the technical school in the State in which the application was made? Would any honorable senator attempt to justify a proposal of that kind? If we were now initiating copyright legislation, would any honorable senator defend a proposal to give the States the right to demand that every work published should be deposited at local institutions? The only reason for the amendment is, as Senator Walker has said, that it represents the State law as at present carried out. Although it is my own State that has moved in this matter, I cannot allow my regard for the interests of that State to compel me to do violence to my sense of what is equitable and just.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I had no intention to speak again but Senator Millen's remarks have compelled me to do so. The honorable senator speaks of the immorality and the injustice of the proposal. I believe that it is in the interests of the State, that it is just, and that it is thoroughly moral, if the question of morals can enter into the subject at all. In every civilized State strong views are held with regard to the regulation of literary matters. Almost every State does its best to get together as complete a collection of its own literature as it can. This is done in New South Wales and in other States of Australia, and we know that in America and in Great Britain every effort is made to make as complete a collection as possible of the literature of the country. We should hesitate before we do anything to withdraw this right.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We are not seeking to withdraw it. If it be a right we would continue it.

Senator PULSFORD.—The honorable and learned senator is doing his best to prevent this being done, and he impugns even the honesty of the proposal.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What we say is, "Do not perpetuate an iniquity."

Senator PULSFORD.—My object in rising is to show that there is no iniquity other than that which exists in the minds of Senators Symon and Millen. With regard to the matter of cost, Mr. Anderson estimates that if the newspapers filed in the New South Wales library had to be paid for, the expenditure would run into between £500 and £600 a year. I have no doubt that these newspapers do not cost the people who send them to the library as much as £50 per year. I know something of the cost of producing newspapers, and the cost of a single copy of a newspaper is not worth talking about. But if the States Governments were to be called upon to subscribe to every newspaper published in the Commonwealth, it would mean throughout Australia an addition to States taxation of something like £2,000 a year. We are not called upon to take any step which will add that amount to the taxation of the people of the States.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I remember that at one time when I was working on a new gold-field, a mare of mine cast a foal. That foal grew up to be a very fine colt, for which I got a handsome price. The colt did not cost me a farthing, and, therefore, according to Senator Pulsford, I should have given him to the public. That is the honorable senator's argument. He says that as newspapers do not cost their proprietors very much, they should make a present of them to all and sundry.

Senator PULSFORD.—I did not say all and sundry. I said to the principal library of each State.

Senator GIVENS.—If it is right and equitable that they should be compelled to do that, they should also be compelled to present copies of their newspapers to every library in each State. I have been a publisher of a newspaper myself, and I know that this provision has often caused me inconvenience and trouble, which I would not willingly have undertaken for a couple of pounds. Senator Pulsford has said on the authority of Mr. Anderson, of the Public Library of New South Wales, that the newspapers which that institution is enabled to exact from proprietors amount in value to from £500 to £600 a year. What right have the public of New South Wales to demand that the proprietors of newspapers shall contribute property of that value to one particular institution? New South Wales is a very extensive State, and the people of many important towns throughout the State derive no benefit from the Public Library in Sydney, and many of them very rarely ever see it. Why should the newspaper proprietors throughout that State be penalized for the benefit of a Public Library in one corner of it? I point out that the publication of many country newspapers does not pay as a purely commercial enterprise, and the proprietors of country newspapers have often a hard struggle to make a living. Why should they be subjected to this tax for the benefit of a particular public institution. I agree with Senator Pulsford that it is exceedingly desirable that in all the States every provision should be made for a complete collection of the newspapers and books published in those States, but it should be done at the public expense, and not at the expense of the unfortunate authors and proprietors. If this is done for the benefit of the public, they should bear the burden and should not loaf on newspaper proprietors and authors.

Senator MILLEN.—There are dozens of country newspapers that are merely struggling to continue publication.

Senator GIVENS.—Many of them are enterprises in which public-spirited men have been sinking money for years.

Senator PULSFORD.—They are pleased to have their newspapers kept in the Public Library.

Senator GIVENS.—If they are, why should we hold a pistol to their heads and compel them to send copies of their newspapers to a library when, if it pleases them to do so, they will do so voluntarily?

Senator MILLEN. — The fact that they will not do so is shown by Mr. Anderson's fear of the consequences if this provision is not enacted.

Senator GIVENS.—Of course he fears that it will cost his library £500 or £600 a year. I hope that honorable senators will in this matter do what is fair, and will be guided by what, after all, is only common honesty.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I find great difficulty in making up my mind on this question. Listening to the inflammatory language of Senator Symon, who talked of holding a pistol to people's heads, I was filled with zeal to support the honorable and learned senator's contention, but listening later on to the cool, calm, and reasonable language of Senator Pulsford, I came to the conclusion that probably there might be something in the idea of keeping a permanent record in some safe place of all the newspapers and books published in each State. After more mature consideration I really think that there is something in that idea. Of course we cannot have a complete record of this kind in every town in each State, and the capital city of each State is the most convenient place in which to keep such a record. Copies of the newspapers and books published every year in the States might not be of any great value from our point of view, but when a hundred years hence the history of Australia comes to be written, probably by some descendant of Senator Symon or of Senator Smith—if the taste for history is at all hereditary — these records will be found to be most valuable. After hearing the argument, I am inclined to support the amendment.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (by Senator KEATING) agreed to—

That after the word "thereupon," line 5, the following words be inserted—"so far as is necessary for the purposes of this section."

Amendment (by Senator KEATING) proposed—

That the following words be left out—"so far as they have any relation to copyrights," lines 7 and 8.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think a little explanation from Senator Keating is desirable. The provision as it stands is that—

The State Copyright Acts of the State shall, so far as they have any relation to copyrights, cease to be administered by the State, and shall thereafter be administered by the Commonwealth. But we have inserted after the word "thereupon" the words—so far as is necessary for the purposes of this section.

Why does he not retain the words "so far as they have any relation to copyrights"?

Senator KEATING. — Because just before the suspension for dinner, we put the provision in the governing part of the clause.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — We shall have a very clumsy section if this amendment is made; but we can see the clause when it is reprinted.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—Just before the sitting was suspended for dinner, we inserted, after the word "State," in the governing part of the clause, that is, before paragraph a, the words — so far as they relate to the registration of the copyright in any book, the performing right in any musical or dramatic work, the lecturing right in any lecture, and the copyright in any artistic or fine art work, or to the registration of any assignment or grant of, or licence in relation to, any such right.

The insertion of those words, in the first part of the clause, makes it unnecessary for us to put in paragraph a or paragraph b anything which would be a repetition of that amendment or part thereof. This amendment will materially shorten the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—In accordance with notice, I move—

That the following words, lines 10 to 14, be left out—"so far as is necessary for the purpose of completing then pending proceedings and of giving effect to then existing rights."

This also is one of the four amendments of which I gave notice last week, in the one paper, and which are all to effect the same object that we have in view, namely, that the Bill shall only apply so far as it comes in conflict with any of the State laws.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think that greater consideration ought to be given to this amendment. We are asked to omit words which we ought to preserve. The administration of the States Acts will cease, so far as they give anybody copyright the moment this Bill comes into operation; but all existing rights will remain, and for the purpose of effectuating those rights, the administration of the States Acts must be in the hands of the Commonwealth. I cannot understand how the omission of these words is dependent upon the words which were inserted just before the suspension for dinner. All we did in inserting the first amendment was to say that the Governor-General in Council may, by proclamation, declare that on a certain date, the administration of the Copyrights Acts of any State, so far as they relate to registration, shall be transferred to the Commonwealth, but there is nothing in that amendment referring to existing rights, which are to be preserved. I think Senator Keating will see that the only words to preserve existing rights are those which he now proposes to strike out. I suppose there are hundreds of copyrights in operation under States Acts, but these will not be preserved if the present amendment be agreed to.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I think that the words I seek to have omitted do not depend upon the previous amendment. I notice that in section 19, the Patents Act of 1903 provides that on a date to be specified by proclamation—

The State Patents Acts of the State referred to shall, so far as they have any relation to patents, cease to be administered by the State, and the Commonwealth shall thereafter administer the same so far as is necessary for the purpose of completing then pending proceedings and of giving effect to then existing rights.

I think that the words to which Senator Symon has called my attention may be allowed to remain in the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13—

(2) Copyright shall subsist in every book, whether the author is a British subject or not, which has, after the commencement of this Act, been first published in Australia, before or simultaneously with its first publication elsewhere.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—The first sub-clause is a very good and complete one, but obviously the words "before or" in sub-clause 2, are unnecessary, because, if a work is "first published in Australia," that must be before publication elsewhere.

Senator KEATING.—Does the honorable and learned senator mean that we should leave out the word "before"?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No. I have a suggestion to make, which, I think, will make the clause more artistic and read very much better. What has to be provided for is the simultaneous publication. Therefore, I move—

That after the word "Australia," line 4, the following words be inserted—"or of which the first publication in Australia is simultaneous with first publication elsewhere."

In clause 5, we have a definition of "simultaneous," which would apply to the next two clauses as well as to this clause. In that clause, the word "simultaneously" is not used, and it is better to adhere to the use of the word "simultaneous" in order to prevent litigation.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—At first, I was inclined to think that the insertion of these words would do no harm, and might give an artistic finish to the clause, but now I think they would be dangerous. We should be using the word "published" in the first part of the clause, and the words "first publication" in the amendment.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Those words are defined in clause 5.

Senator KEATING.—The words "before or" must remain in, because first publication in Australia means that the work has first been published in Australia itself. The words "been first published in Australia" do not mean "absolutely published for the first time in Australia," but they mean "the first publication of which in Australia" shall be before or simultaneously with first publication elsewhere.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—I think that my honorable and learned friend is mistaken. "First published in Australia" means first published here of all places of the world; because the Bill afterwards says that when a work is simultaneously published here it shall be entitled to copyright. Clause 5 says—

For the purpose of this Act, publication, performance, or delivery in the Commonwealth shall be deemed to be simultaneous with publication, performance, or delivery elsewhere, if the period between the publications, performances, or deliveries does not exceed fourteen days.

That is to say, when a work is first performed in Australia, in comparison with any other part of the British dominions, that gives a right to copyright in Australia. Of course, there can be no copyright in Australia in conflict with copyright in Great Britain. If a work is first published in England, copyright in Australia has gone, except by virtue of the Imperial law, which confers the privilege of copyright in the British dominions because of publication in England.

Senator GIVENS. — Does the English copyright law extend to all parts of the British dominions?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Undoubtedly. If there were no State copyright law, and we did not pass this Bill, copyright in Australia would apply to works first published in England. There are two kinds of copyright conferred by this Bill. When a book is published here before it has been published anywhere else, that gives copyright. But publication in Australia, which is not first in point of time, but which is simultaneous—that is to say, when the book is published here within fourteen days of publication elsewhere—also gives copyright. Consequently, what we have to do is to provide for two things—first, copyright for a book first published in Australia; and, secondly, copyright for a book published here simultaneously with publication elsewhere. The amendment which I have moved is to provide that a work which has been first published in Australia, or of which the first publication in Australia is simultaneous with publication elsewhere, shall have copyright. By way of illustration, take clauses 14 and 15. Take a lecturing right. It subsists in every lecture which has "been first delivered in public in Australia;" and that means clearly the first delivery of that lecture in public here, or simultaneously with its first delivery in public elsewhere. Unless this amendment is carried, we shall first of all introduce a limitation on "first publication" by saying that it means "before publication elsewhere." If that means anything, it emphasizes what I have said about first publication being in reference to the whole of the British dominions. Or, if we say that it means "simultaneously with publication elsewhere," we are departing from the language used in clause 15. I think the clauses of this Bill should be as connected and as harmonious as possible.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales). —If Senator Keating's interpretation of this clause is correct, some curious results are likely to follow. I understand him to say that, as he interprets the words "first published in Australia," they mean that a book may have been published anywhere else, or in a dozen other countries, but on its being first published in Australia it secures copyright. Does he mean to say that I can bring out Milton's Paradise Lost in Australia and copyright it because it is then published here for the first time?

Senator KEATING.—Certainly not.

Senator MILLEN.—If the words "first published in Australia" mean—as I think they do—the first time a work has been published anywhere, that is intelligible. The purpose of this clause is to lay down the conditions under which copyright accrues, and it is clear that it is intended to mean that when a work makes its first appearance in Australia copyright accrues. Senator Keating, however, says that that is not meant—that the work may have been published in America, or in France, or in Germany, or in fifty other countries, but that the moment it is published here for the first time it secures copyright.

Senator KEATING.—No; if the first publication here is before or simultaneous with publication elsewhere.

Senator MILLEN.—Then either the wording of the clause is wrong, or Senator Keating's interpretation is wrong. I understand him to say that first publication in Australia means the first publication of a particular book, irrespective of whether it has been previously published in any other country or not. It may have been published in fifty other places, but when it is published here that gives copyright.

Senator KEATING.—No.

Senator MILLEN.—Then I really cannot understand the honorable senator. I wish to know whether or not the clause is intended to mean that a work can be published elsewhere, but that the moment it is published here it can secure copyright. I do not wish to delay the Bill, but it is one thing to expedite legislation, and quite another thing to make ourselves ridiculous, not only in the eyes of the public, but in our own eyes. It seems to me that we have had two meanings from the Minister in charge of the Bill. One is that "first publication in Australia" means that the first publication of a particular work is made here, although it may previously have been published elsewhere. If that be so, the words "before or simultaneously with its first publication elsewhere" become a rank absurdity. On the other hand, if Senator Keating's other interpretation be correct, the words "before or simultaneously with" kill the first portion of the clause. One or the other interpretation is ridiculous.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I will endeavour to give a concrete instance. The next two clauses refer to performing rights and lecturing rights. They are all framed on the same principle—that first publication, first performance, and first delivery in Australia, either prior to or simultaneously with first publication, first performance, or first delivery elsewhere, will enable copyright to subsist. It is as well to remember that copyright under this measure may be obtained in two ways. First, the person who is entitled to copyright, by virtue of first publication here, has all the advantages and privileges of this measure conferred upon him. These are over and above any advantages or privileges or facilities that may be conferred upon another by virtue of international or Imperial copyright, which privileges do not subsist under this Bill itself, but perhaps under some Imperial enactment. These latter may be registered here for their original value. I will take as an illustration the case of the performing right of some play. We will say that a drama is written in England or in America, and is called

Upper Life. Suppose that that drama is first produced in London on the 1st March of this year, and is first produced in Australia on the 1st September of this year. Obviously its first production in Australia is after its first production elsewhere, and there is no copyright here. But suppose that it is first produced in London on the 1st August, and is first produced in Australia on the 1st August, or within fourteen days after. That is first production in Australia, not before, but simultaneously, because the Bill provides that a period of fourteen days is to be regarded as simultaneous with first production elsewhere. The words of the clause are perfectly correct. They say that copyright shall subsist in a book which has been first published in Australia—not which is absolutely first published as a book, but which has been first published in Australia, either before or simultaneously with its first publication elsewhere. What is wrong with that?

Senator MILLEN.—Because its first publication in Australia must be necessary before publication elsewhere.

Senator KEATING.—The honorable senator may any day see announcements that a drama will be "first produced in Australia on Saturday next," though that drama may have been produced elsewhere two years before.

Senator MILLEN.—But does that publication give copyright?

Senator KEATING.—No; I am speaking of what is ordinarily understood by the public. A book may be first published in Australia last week, but it may have been published in England six months ago. We provide that if a book is published here, before or simultaneously with its publication elsewhere, with a margin of fourteen days, that shall be first publication here. I submit that the clause, as it stands, carries out its object, and if we adopt the amendment that has been suggested we shall cause doubt and obscurity.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I seem to have got some glimmering from the theatrical example cited, of what Senator Keating is driving at. If the word "first" were left out the clause would be intelligible to the ordinary man.

Senator BEST.—The word "first" makes no difference.

Senator KEATING.—The word "first" may be struck out if honorable senators desire.

Senator MILLEN.—I think that the word "first" makes a big difference.

Senator BEST.—Not at all.

Senator MILLEN.—Does Senator Best favour the insertion of a lot of unnecessary words, the only effect of which can be to confuse?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I ask leave to withdraw my amendment, in order to give Senator Millen an opportunity to submit the proposal he has indicated.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Senator MILLEN) agreed to—

That the word "first," line 4, be left out.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—With all due deference to Senator Millen, I think that my amendment would have been better, but, at any rate, the amendment just passed will remove what would probably be a fertile source of confusion.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14 consequentially amended and agreed to.

Clause 15—

(2) Lecturing right shall subsist in every lecture which has . . . been first delivered in public in Australia, before or simultaneously with its first delivery in public elsewhere.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—Will this clause apply to lectures delivered at a University by a professor? University professors are paid like a schoolmaster to lecture to the students, and I should like to know whether any of the latter would be debarred from taking notes of lectures so delivered.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania — Honorary Minister).—Under this clause a University student would be at perfect liberty to take whatever notes of a lecture he thought necessary for his own private use, but he would not be allowed to take an extended note, such as a shorthand note, and publish the lecture without the authority of the lecturer. A student should not be permitted to deprive the person who has prepared the lecture of the material advantage likely to be gained from his right to its delivery.

That the word "first," lines 2 and 4, be left out.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Apart from the ordinary statute law of copyright, a lecturer has a property in his lecture. It was held in the celebrated case of that very distinguished Scotch professor, Professor Caird, that whilst his students were perfectly entitled to take even shorthand notes for their own private use, they were not entitled to use them for the purpose of lecturing themselves, or for publication in book form. A student or some one else had taken notes of Professor Caird's lectures, and proposed to publish them in pamphlet form, but was restrained by an order of the Court from doing so. In passing, I should like to point out that it is a little difficult to understand how a lecture could be delivered simultaneously in, say, England and here.

Senator KEATING.—One lecture could be delivered by two lecturers simultaneously in different places.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I merely point out that the clause reads rather funnily, and it provides for a condition of things not usual or very likely to arise. It is very seldom that a lecture is delivered at the same time in two places, even by two different lecturers. However, I do not suggest that the clause should be struck out, because there is nothing impossible under the sun.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania — Honorary Minister).—A person who prepares a lecture may, while reserving the rights in it to himself, license some one to deliver it elsewhere.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is the intention of the clause, I take it.

Senator KEATING.—Yes. For instance, a person who prepares a lecture, may license some one to deliver it in New Zealand, but, of course, if the lecture were delivered there a considerable time before it was delivered in Australia, the copyright would be lost here.

Senator DOBSON.—Is there a single copyright Act in which the word "first" does not appear?

Senator KEATING.—I do not know that the word is of any importance.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16—

(3) The lecturing right in a lecture shall begin with its first delivery in public in Australia.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Is this clause quite complete in regard to the lecturing right? What about a simultaneous delivery elsewhere?

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—If a lecture is delivered simultaneously elsewhere, the right dates from its first delivery in Australia the same as the publication of a book, or the performance of a drama.

Clause agreed to.

(1) The copyright in a book, the performing right in a dramatic or musical work, and the lecturing right in a lecture, shall subsist for the term of the author's life, and thirty years after the end of the year in which he dies, and no longer.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I object to the term proposed for the duration of a copyright. I pointed out on the motion for the second reading, how it is quite possible for a valuable work to be written and published by an author in a very early period in his life, and for that author to live, as some of our distinguished writers have lived, to an advanced age. It is true that on the contrary, some authors have died at a comparatively early age; and if the clause be allowed to remain as at present, it will not operate fairly as between the two classes. Certainly the heirs of an author who dies young will not reap the same advantage, as will the heirs of an author who dies at an advanced age. In any case, the period is too long. For instance, as has often happened, a young author, before reaching the age of twenty-five years, may publish a valuable book, and if he lives to the age of seventy-five, that work may be copyrighted for something over one hundred years. The English Act provides that copyright shall subsist for seven years after the author's death, or for a period of forty-two years, whichever is the longer. In my opinion, forty-two years is too long for copyright to last. It is certainly desirable that there should be a fixed period, failing the author's life extending to that period. It must be remembered that no author is absolutely the creator of any work. We are the heirs of all the ages and of the accumulated knowledge of all the ages, and authors certainly owe some debt to the public who have supplied them with knowledge. They ought not to wrap themselves up in selfishness, and say that knowledge obtained from those who have gone before should remain their exclusive property for a very extended period. I think that the period proposed is too long. It would have the effect of limiting the publication of valuable works at a time when they ought to be free to the public. I have no desire to do any injustice to an author, but if he has the exclusive right to the publication of his own productions during his lifetime, and if it continues to vest in his children after his death until they reach the age of manhood or womanhood, that is all that any author should demand.

Senator MILLEN.—That might be longer than the Bill provides for.

Senator GIVENS.—It could not possibly be longer, because it would not take thirty years after an author's death for his children to reach the age of manhood or womanhood. I move—

That the word "thirty," line 4, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "seven."

If that amendment is agreed to, I shall later on in the clause endeavour to make provision for a fixed period of copyright, and to provide that whichever is the longer term, the fixed period or the life of the author and seven years, shall be the period for which copyright shall endure.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—This is undoubtedly, if not the most important, one of the most important provisions of the Bill. The whole advantage or disadvantage of the Bill rests on the duration of the copyright granted under it. The property which we propose to confer upon an author of a work depends on the duration of the copyright which we give him. I agree very largely with the sentiments expressed by Senator Givens, and I shall ask the honorable senator to allow me to move a prior amendment, which will differ only in one respect from that which he has proposed. I desire to propose that there shall be a fixed period of forty-two years.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Dead or alive.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes, dead or alive. That is to say, that a man's property in his book shall be worth forty-two years purchase at least, but if he lives longer he should have that additional advantage.

Senator WALKER.—That is the English law.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is the English law, and the law which prevails in every State of the Commonwealth, with this difference, that the English law gives the author seven years beyond his life. I never could see, and do not now see, any reason why we should add on that period of seven years.

Senator GIVENS.—The author may leave young children who have not arrived at an age when they can provide for themselves.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is true. I took the liberty on the second reading of the Bill of dealing at some length with this question, and I should like to say one or two words now in elucidation of what this principle of copyright is. A man publishes his book, and unless there is some tangible property, measurable, as lawyers say, by metes and bounds, he cannot deal with it. The difficulty, which was met by copyright legislation, was the difficulty of making measureable, and capable of being valued, the property which a man had in the productions of his own intellect, as expressed in words. It was like giving him a lease, and saying that he should have a certain right for so many years. If a fixed period were decided on, with an absolute power to stop any one else from reproducing his work, he could go to his publisher, and say, "I have this to sell you. Here is my book, and attached to it there is a monopoly of publication for a fixed period." The publisher would then know exactly what he was going to buy. He would be able to estimate his probable profit during that fixed period, and as the author would be also in a position to make an estimate, he could not be taken advantage of.

Senator GIVENS.—It will be only eight years, if the clause is allowed to remain as it stands.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It could not be less than thirty years. Under this clause it is proposed that copyright shall be given for the author's life and thirty years after the end of the year in which he dies. The effect of such a provision would be that we should have two measurements of the value of the property the author is to get. One is an absolutely uncertain measurement, and the other is certain. I propose to make an absolutely certain measurement.

Senator GIVENS.—And equal all round.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—And equal all round. If a man goes to a publisher, and says that his interest in his book is a life interest, the publisher may say, "You may die to-morrow; I can give you only so much for it. If your interest is for life and thirty years, I can only pay you for a thirty years' interest, and a margin of, perhaps, a year or two longer. The uncertainty of life is great, and I cannot possibly assess what your work is worth to me for the period covered by your life interest." We may make the period long or short, but if we fix a definite period, the author is given something with which he can go to a publisher, and say, "I give you this book, with so many years' purchase of the monopoly of its publication." If forty-two years is not long enough, the Committee can make it longer, but I think it is long enough. In Canada, the term is twenty-eight years.

Senator KEATING.—With an opportunity given for an extension for fourteen years.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes, it is like the patents law. Here with regard to a patent, the period of protection is fourteen years, with a qualified right of extension for a further seven years, or, in exceptional circumstances, for fourteen years. I prefer a definite fixed period, and I say that the duration of the copyright should be forty or forty-two years, or the life of the author, whichever is the longer term. That, in my opinion, would be ample. The publisher can make his estimate of purchase on a certain period of forty or forty-two years, and if the author lives longer so much the better for himself and his children.

Senator GIVENS.—I intended to propose a fixed period of thirty-five years.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I suggest forty-two years, because that is the period adopted by the Imperial Legislature, and adopted in State legislation throughout Australia, relying on the English precedent. I feel that that is long enough. I remind honorable senators that when, in 1841, it was sought to make the duration of copyright extend during the life of the author and sixty years beyond, the proposal was defeated at the instance of Lord Macaulay, one of the greatest literary men of the last century. In the following year Lord Mahon, afterwards Lord Stanhope, brought in his Bill shortening the period to twenty-five years beyond the life of the author. That was again opposed by Lord Macaulay, whose views had the greater force, because copyright so gravely affected himself and his own literary productions. The period was then reduced to what is at present the law—forty-two years, or the life of the author plus seven years, whichever term is the longer. I say that we should leave it at that. It has been at that for more than sixty years. In 1875 a Royal Commission made certain suggestions which have never been carried into law, and, so far as I am aware, the term fixed has worked satisfactorily, and has given to authors a property in their works in a form which is beneficial to them, and which has enabled them to secure a fair price for their work. Every one is aware that a monopoly for a fixed period is a much more saleable product than is a monopoly for an uncertain period. It is like so many years purchase. We give an author a monopoly for a period of so many years, and if he lives longer, and retains his copyright, he has it until his days are ended. If he lives for fifty or sixty years there will have been ample time for him to derive from his copyright the emoluments necessary to enable him to bequeath the benefit of it to his children. If, on the other hand, copyright is extended beyond the life of the author, it may have passed into the hands of a publisher, who, after the author's death, may make use of it to secure a fortune for himself.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Why should any period after death be allowed?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — I do not propose that any period after death should be allowed. Senator Givens has suggested that we should adhere to the existing period fixed by the English Statute.

Senator GIVENS.—And by State legislation also.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I agree with Senator O'Keefe that we should not allow any period after the death of the author. We can have a fixed period of forty-two years, or if that is not considered long enough it may be extended. I personally think that it is too long, and that from thirty-five to forty years would be long enough, but in any case we should also extend the period during the author's life, if that is longer than the fixed period, in order that if he retains the copyright he may secure the benefit of it during the time he lives.

Senator GIVENS.—What about the case of an author who sells his copyright for a royalty on the publication of his books, and who, when he dies, leaves young children dependent on him?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—He will have had the benefit of the copyright for forty-two years. Suppose he publishes a book when he is sixty years of age?

Senator GIVENS.—Suppose he publishes a book at twenty-five years of age?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—If he publishes a book at sixty years of age, he will get forty-two years copyright of it.

Senator GIVENS.—He may leave young children when he dies, and are they to be deprived of a royalty arising out of the sale of his copyright?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That would depend on the bargain made with the publisher with respect to the royalty. There would be nothing to prevent an author making a bargain with his publisher that a royalty should continue for 100 years after his death.

Senator GIVENS. — No publisher would make such a bargain when he would know that the copyright would expire before that time.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — It would not expire at least for forty-two years. Of course the most valuable books are usually published when a man has reached the maturity of his powers—that is when he is in middle age, and, therefore, the public get the benefit of a fixed period. The great thing we ought to seek to do is to establish a fixed period so as to put an author on a fair footing when bargaining with his publisher. We want to give him a property, that is copyright—and we ought to enable him to bargain on practically equal terms with his publisher. If, on the other hand, the period is left uncertain, he is entirely in the publisher's hands. As Macaulay said, "If you make any amendment in the law, make it in the direction of increasing a fixed period, but do not increase an uncertain period which must always work to the disadvantage of the man who has wares to sell." I propose to move—

That all the words after the word "of," line 4, be left out with a view to insert in lieu thereof the following words—"forty-two years, or for the author's life, whichever shall last the longer."

If that amendment be carried, I shall move the omission of the words "author's life" and "thirty years." This amendment embodies the principle which was advocated by Macaulay, and given effect to by him in legislation still in force on the Imperial statute-book, and it will best carry out first our duty to authors, to give them a property in their works, and secondly our duty to the community to see that the period is not too long, in order that in the case of copyright, as in that of patents, the community shall have the benefit of the work.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I should like to have an opportunity of voting for the amendment foreshadowed by Senator Symon. The chief objection to the amendment of Senator Givens is that it would introduce the element of gambling or speculation. From actuarial tables, we can form a fair idea as to the average duration of life; but still his amendment would introduce the element of speculation in the matter of a copyright. Who would suffer in that case? It would not be the publisher, but the author; and an old author would suffer more than a young one. We ought to give a certain value to a book, just as we give a certain value to a patent. The amendment of Senator Symon would accomplish that object in a very effective manner. In my opinion, it would give a sufficient term of copyright to provide for an author during his life, and also in the greater number of cases for his children after his death. I trust that Senator Givens will withdraw his amendment, and let us have a vote on the proposition of Senator Symon. I shall vote against any amendment designed to enable the chances of an author's life to determine the value of his copyright.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I hope that the same provision will be passed as is contained in the Imperial Act; that is to give copyright for the life of the author, plus seven years, or for forty-two years, whichever is the longer. With regard to the point raised by Senator Pearce, he need not have any apprehension. Supposing that I were a publisher, and were offered a book. I should know that the author would have copyright for his life, and seven years longer, and it would be very easy for me to ascertain the actuarial expectation of his life, and if necessary to insure against his death. I think that in justice to the children of an author there ought to be copyright for a few years after his death. Many an author dies in comparatively old age, leaving young children who are not over-well provided for. A copyright for seven years would be a perfect god-send to the family of many an author. As a rule, authors are impecunious, and therefore are not able to leave their children provided for. I hope that if no one else moves in that direction I shall be at liberty by-and-by to submit an amendment for the adoption of the system which prevails in the United Kingdom, New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—I intend to support the amendment foreshadowed by Senator Symon; because I think it would be better to have a more fixed period than is proposed in the Bill. Otherwise, we should accord a more valuable privilege to a young author than to an old one. According to the Bill there is a specified term after the author's death, in which copyright shall endure, so that a young man of twenty-five years of age would have a clear advantage over a man twice that age. I do not see why we should accord to one man on account of his age a privilege which we do not accord to another. There is no absolute reason why we should not have a fixed term instead of one varied by the life of the author. If a man is fortunate enough to live a considerable time after his work is published, why should he, or, in the event of his death, his children, get a greater advantage than the children of a deceased author? Take the case of Gibbon, who, although he was very wealthy, died a year or two after he had completed his magnum opus—The Decline and Fall of Rome. Under this provision the children of such an author would not be left penniless, but would have the advantage of the copyright in the works which had been published. Lately, Mr. E. V. Lucas has published in twelve volumes, Lamb's Letters, perhaps the most delightful literature in the English language. Unfortunately, the work is not complete, because recently some of Lamb's letters have been discovered and published. If the twelve volumes have been issued, Mr. Lucas is in this position: That he cannot publish them for another forty-two years, although Lamb has been dead for 100 years. It seems, therefore, that under the Imperial Act there is copyright for a term of forty-two years from the date of publication. If that is not provided against in this Bill it should be.

Senator KEATING.—All through the world copyright runs from the date of publication.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Why should the public be deprived of the advantage of a cheap edition of a valuable work for that great length of time? As Senator Symon has quoted the authority of Macaulay, I would mention that Carlyle was also in favour of a fixed period for copyright. In his somewhat characteristic fashion he wrote a petition on the subject, which commenced in these words—

To the honorable the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, the Petition of Thomas Carlyle, a Writer of Books, Humbly sheweth,

That your petitioner has written certain books, being incited thereto by various innocent or laudable considerations, chiefly by the thought that said books might in the end be found to be worth something.

He went on to speak of the publishers, who then got the benefit of the publication, in these terms—

May it therefore please your Honorable House to protect him in said happy and long doubtful event; and (by passing your Copyright Bill) forbid all Thomas Teggs, and other extraneous persons, entirely unconcerned in this adventure of his, to steal from him his small winnings, for a space of sixty years, at shortest. After sixty years, unless your Honorable House provide otherwise, they may begin to steal.

And your petitioner will ever pray,

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Of course, our object is to insure that a publisher shall not begin to steal until the author has enjoyed certain privileges from the sale of his own work. I think that the privilege should be accorded equally to all persons, irrespective of their age. It is here proposed, however, to give advantages according to the age of an author. While I intend to support Senator Symon's proposal, because it is the best that has yet been made, I think that it would be better to make the term forty-two years, without any variation. Why should we not adopt the same principle in the case of copyright as we do in the case of patents, which are for a fixed term?

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I have listened to the remarks of the honorable senators who have addressed themselves to the amendment with great care. It seems to me that there is a disposition on their part to regard this limitation of the term of copyright as being one that will be practically effective in the case of every production that is copyrighted. Quite the contrary is likely to be the case. Experience has shown that the full benefit of the term of copyright is enjoyed in a very small number of cases. Very few books are copyrighted as to which it is necessary to preserve to the authors their rights beyond a very limited period. In a very excellent article contributed to the North American Review in January of this year, Mr. S. L. Clemens, who is better known throughout the world as Mark Twain, says that during the last twenty-five years in the United States more than 100,000 books, and in the last 104 years over 250,000, have been copyrighted. When asked how many of the works survived the forty-two years, he says that the average was five per year. He says that in most instances the term of forty-two years for the operation of copyright, in his opinion, is altogether too short. Mr. Clemens gave evidence before the Copyright Commission in Great Britain, and Lord Thring, in the Nineteenth Century, some little time after the examination made reference to it. I will quote from Lord Thring's article a little later on. The article in the North American Review is in the form of question and answer, and I would draw the attention of Senator Smith to it. It will be seen that, in Mark Twain's opinion, it is desirable that the copyright term should have some relation to the author's life. He says that the present system is—

A crime perpetrated by a great country—a proud World Power—upon ten poor devils a year.

That is to say, to limit the term of copyright to forty-two years is, in the opinion of an author of some experience, a crime. He goes on to say—

The profits on Uncle Tom's Cabin continue to-day; nobody but the publishers get them—Mrs. Stowe's share ceased seven years before she died; her daughters received nothing for the book. Years ago they found themselves no longer able to live in their modest home, and had to move out and find humbler quarters. Washington Irving's poor old adopted daughters fared likewise. Come, does that move you?

That was a case where copyright extended for a limited period, such as is approved of by Senator Symon.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No; that is a case where the copyright was sold.

Senator KEATING.—The term had expired seven years before the authoress of the book died.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The copyright in Uncle Tom's Cabin was sold long before the death of the authoress.

Senator KEATING.—It appears, from this article, that the term of copyright had run out while the authoress was still alive. The publishers who had issued the book in the meantime were not philanthropists. As soon as the forty-two years' limit expired, they did not care whether the authoress or her relatives were well provided for or not. They concerned themselves with their own interests.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That was similar to the case of Milton's daughter, referred to in Macaulay's speech, which I quoted.

Senator KEATING. — Senator Symon has made reference to the fact that a forty-two years' period is fixed in the English law, and he says that he understands that that has always given satisfaction. The Royal Commission to which reference has been made during the debate, and which sat in England for two or three years to investigate the whole subject of copyright in Great Britain and other civilized countries, dealt exhaustively with this point. They say with regard to the period that Senator Walker seems to favour—life, plus seven years, or forty-two years, whichever may be longer—and with regard to the fixed term of forty-two years from publication, or life, whichever may be longer, favoured by Senator Symon—

The term of copyright in books is for the life of the author and seven years after his death, or for forty-two years from the date of publication, whichever period may happen to expire last. . . . First, the period is said not to be long enough. The chief reasons for this assertion are that many works, and particularly those of permanent value, are frequently but little known or appreciated for many years after they are published, and that they do not command a sale sufficient to remunerate the authors until a considerable part of the term of copyright has expired. Some works, as, for instance, novels by popular authors, command an extensive sale, and bring to the authors a large remuneration at once, but the case is altogether different with others, such as works of history, books of a philosophical or classical character, and volumes of poems. In some instances, works of these kinds have been known to produce scarcely any remuneration, until the authors have died, and the copyrights have nearly expired. It is also urged that in the case of many authors who make their living by their pens, their families are left without provision shortly after their deaths, unless their works become profitable very soon after they are written.

In the case of ephemeral literature, such as novels, the author looks to get practically the whole of the return from the sale of his books within a year or a couple of years from publication. The remaining thirty-five or thirty-six years of the term of copyright are worth very little to him. Consequently we find to-day that works which were published only a few years ago, and which have a term of copyright, extending over the life of the author and seven years, or for forty-two years, whichever may be longer, are selling in sixpenny editions; the reason being that the remaining term of copyright is of very little value. The books have had their day. But historical works and books of research, as pointed out in the English report, very often do not acquire their full value in the eyes of the public until many years of the copyright term have elapsed. In some cases their value is not fully appreciated until after the death of the author. If we abridge the term of copyright, authors who have derived no benefit from works of that character, would be the less likely to derive any. The Royal Commission in Great Britain, after considering the term of copyright existing in various countries, unanimously recommend the adoption of a term extending over the life of the author and thirty years after. They say, in paragraph 39 of their report—

We find considerable variety in the terms fixed in other countries, but putting aside the United States, which seems to have adopted our existing term with modifications, we find that the more important nations have adopted terms longer than our own. Thus, the term in France is the life of the author and fifty years; in Belgium, life and twenty years; in Germany, life and thirty years; in Italy, life and forty years, with a second term of forty years, during which other persons than the proprietor may publish a work on payment of a royalty to him; in Russia, life and fifty years; in Spain, life and fifty years; in Portugal, life and fifty years; and in Holland, life and twenty years. These terms are subject to sundry modifications and conditions which it is unnecessary for us to enter into, but while we consider it expedient that the existing term of copyright should be altered, we think that the terms fixed by the nations we have referred to are, in some cases, excessive and unnecessary.

In an article in the Nineteenth Century for June, 1900, Lord Thring said—

Mr. Clemens (Mark Twain), in the excellent evidence he gave to the Select Committee of the House of Lords, maintained with great plausibility the proposal that copyright should be perpetual, for the sake of "the Immortals," as he termed them.

Senator GIVENS. — Who would receive the benefit of a perpetual copyright?

Senator KEATING.—The descendants. It is maintained that the publisher shall not get the copyright, but the descendants of an author.

He reckoned that the number of British authors in a century, whose works survived forty-two years (the limit fixed by the existing law), was sixty-five. He allotted to each of them ten volumes, and concluded that 650 volumes was the total limit of surviving volumes in the century. Why, he asks, should the richest nation on the earth, by limiting copyright, annually take out of the pockets of the children of the little handful of illustrious men the trifling sums which they would derive from the sale of these volumes.

What follows is in small type, and therefore I presume it is the evidence of Mr. Clemens to which I have just referred—

Great Britain issues 5,000 new books per year. None of these, except six and a half volumes, need the Committee's help. The others will never reach within a thousand miles of the forty-two year limit. They are amply, and even superfluously and extravagantly, protected. The mighty bulk of them will be dead and gone inside of five years. A few of them will live fifteen, others will live ten; but if you average the life of the 5,000 books straight through, a copyright limit of six months would answer all their necessities. The Committee is in no way concerned about their salvation; no legislation could achieve it. The whole batch can be set aside as being perfectly safe under the existing law, or any other for that matter. The only real question, the only important question, the only high and worthy question, as it seems to me, is how to save the six and a half volumes.

Practical experience shows that this term of copyright would, in actual fact, apply to such a small proportion as six and a half books out of 5,000; and honorable senators will recognise that, by providing this term, we are not inflicting any injury or hardship on the public. As pointed out in the report from which I have quoted, the works which do survive forty-two years are mostly of a character which have to wait for a considerable time, and receive the attention of students and others, before their real value is recognised, and they begin to grow in demand. Under all the circumstances, the report recommends that the term should be for life and thirty years; and there is reason to believe that, if in Great Britain the copyright law were recodified, that term would be adopted. If that were so, there would then be harmony between the British Act and the Act of the Commonwealth. A term for life and thirty years afterwards has an advantage over the proposal of Senator Symon. The honorable and learned senator proposes forty-two years, or the life of the author, whichever period is the longer, thus providing an alternative. The life of the author, of course, is not a fixed term, and when he goes to negotiate with a publisher, the latter is not in a position to know how long he will have the copyright for.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — There would be the fixed term of forty-two years.

Senator KEATING. — It has been pointed out during the debate that if a young man of twenty-odd years of age published a book, he would get protection for forty-two years, or for his life, whichever period was the longer. It has been suggested that the same man might twenty years later bring out another book, and that, in respect to the latter, the terms would be the same; but, if the forty-two years' proposal operated in both cases, the copyrights would fall in at different dates, and publishers would not be aware of the fact. A man between the ages of thirty and forty-five years might publish one or two books every year; and if he died at the age of sixty, the determination of the various copyrights would be different.

Senator GIVENS.—Why should it not?

Senator KEATING.—There would be no chance of knowing when the copyrights would fall in.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The period of forty-two years would be fixed.

Senator KEATING.—The same Commission, in paragraphs 29, 30, and 31 of their report, state—

29. The second objection to the present duration of copyright is, that copyrights belonging to the same author generally expire at different dates. That it is well founded is manifest, for if an author writes several works, or one work in several volumes which are published at different times, as is frequently the case, the copyrights will expire forty-two years from the respective dates of publication, unless the author happens to live so long that the period of seven years after his death is beyond forty-two years from the publication of his latest work or volume.

30. Under the present system, moreover, copyright in an early edition, expires before copyright in the amendments in a later edition of the same work. We have had evidence that in one case the first and uncorrected edition of an important work was republished before the expiration of the copyright in the later and improved editions.

31. . . . Under the present law it is uncertain what constitutes publication; but whatever may be a publication sufficient in law to set the period of copyright running, it generally takes place in such a manner that the precise date is not noted, even if known.

Copyrights subsist under the Bill from the date of first publication, independently of registration; and all kinds of questions would arise as to whether a book brought out in a certain year has had its full term of forty-two years. If, on the other hand, we make the term for life, plus thirty years, it could always be ascertained with exactness when a person died, and it would be easy to determine to a day when the copyrights ran out. This matter had caused extreme difficulty in England, and evidence was given at the inquiry by publishers and others.

Senator GIVENS.—Why study the publishers, when we are concerned with the authors?

Senator KEATING.—The Royal Commission did not confine their attention to the interests of publishers, as will be seen on reference to the list of witnesses examined during the three years.

Senator GIVENS.—What interest would the author have in the matter when he was dead?

Senator KEATING.—An author when alive would have the interest that after his death the rights in his works, if they were of any value, would be preserved to his family or his representatives for the definite period of thirty years. If, on the other hand, he was an author who worked intermittently, he would simply have the half satisfaction of knowing that, in respect of some of his works, there would be a fair measure of copyright, and in respect to others, the value of which had not been properly appreciated, that the copyright was very nearly running out. Under all the circumstances, seeing that the matter has been reported on so fully in the light of the best evidence procurable, we should be well advised in adopting the term recommended by the Royal Commission, in the interests of the author himself, of those who represent him after his death, and of the public.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—Senator Keating has made a very excellent fight, not necessarily for his view, or for any view entertained in Australia, but for the view of a Royal Commission, the report of which has been allowed to lie dormant and accumulate dust for the last thirty years. The answer to Senator Keating is that this report has never been acted upon.

Senator KEATING.—The House of Lords passed the Bill.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — The Bill has never been enacted.

Senator KEATING.—The Bill itself, providing this term, was passed by the House of Lords.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What is the use of talking about the Bill being passed by the House of Lords, which is the more insignificant portion of the Imperial Parliament?

Senator KEATING.—The honorable and learned senator said that the report had never been acted upon.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not call that acting upon the report.

Senator KEATING.—I do.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That only shows that Senator Keating does not use terms accurately. The report of the Royal Commission has not been acted upon legislatively.

Senator KEATING.—Why did the honorable and learned senator use the word "legislatively"?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Because I was speaking legislatively. The recommendations of the Royal Commission have never been given legislative force. Senator Keating has made excellent use of the report, but what is the use of quoting recommendations which were made twenty-seven years ago, and which the Imperial Parliament has not brought into force by legislation? Both Senator Keating and myself want a fixed period, that favoured by the honorable and learned gentleman being thirty years, whereas I propose forty-two years. The fixed period proposed by the honorable and learned senator is attached to the uncertain period of a man's life, and that, of course, is nothing on which to negotiate with a publisher. It is valuable to have a fixed period of thirty years or forty-two years, but an author would be entirely in the hands of a publisher as to what was uncertain. The whole tendency of legislation in the past in England has been, if possible, to lengthen the fixed period and diminish the uncertain period, and if there be an alternative, subject to the point referred to by Senator Givens, it ought to be in the direction of strengthening the fixed period.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I have no intention to stand in the way of Senator Symon submitting his amendment, and I shall ask leave to withdraw my proposal, in order to give him an opportunity. So far, I have heard no argument to induce me to believe that any of the suggestions made are more commendable than my own proposal. I fail to see the force of some of the arguments which have been used by Senator Symon and others, as to the desirability of accepting his amendment in preference to mine. It has been said that my amendment introduces a gambling element, but the same gambling element is in the proposal suggested by Senator Symon. My proposal is that the term shall be the author's life and seven years, or a fixed period of forty-two years, whichever is the longer, whereas Senator Symon's proposal is that there shall be fixed period of forty-two years or the author's life, whichever is the longer. I should like to ask those who say that my amendment introduces the gambling element whether there is more of the gambling element in a provision for a period covering the life of a man and seven years than in one covering his life without seven years. This is a ridiculous argument to put forward in support of Senator Symon's amendment. It might frequently happen that a man would die at just about the time when the forty-two years fixed period would expire. Immediately he was dead, copyright in his works would expire, and then the hardship would arise which Senator Keating quoted for us as indicated by Mark Twain, and commented on by Lord Thring.

Senator GUTHRIE.—His work might not be published for seven years after his death.

Senator GIVENS.—Then there would be a fixed period of copyright for forty-two years. Suppose the fixed period of forty-two years, and an author's life expire about the same time, say, for instance, that a man publishes a work at thirty, and dies at seventy-two years of age, his copyright in that work would cease exactly at the time he died, notwithstanding the fixed period suggested by Senator Symon. It would be a very great hardship indeed if he left a widow or young children that they should be absolutely deprived by his death of all profit from his work. Such cases are possible, and it is our duty to avoid giving rise to such hardships if we can. A publisher cannot be expected to give any of the proceeds from the publication of the works of an author to his relatives after his death, if the period of copyright in those works has expired. In these days, when competition is so keen, it is probable that there is not one publisher who could afford to do so, because every publisher has then the same right to publish those books, prices are cut down to bedrock, and only sufficient is left for ordinary trade profit. In justice, therefore, to relatives who may be dependent on an author, it is desirable that we should give a copyright for seven years in addition to his life as an alternative to the fixed period of forty-two years. I point out that in doing so we shall only be acting in accordance with what has already been done in Great Britain, and in every State of the Commonwealth. I have never heard that a single word has been raised against that provision in Australia or in Great Britain. I am inclined to think that a fixed period of forty-two years is rather too long, but as it seems to be the general wish of the Committee to enact a fixed period of that duration I waive my objection to it. But I am not willing to agree to a fixed period of forty-two years and an alternative of the life of the author. I favour the provision of the law of Great Britain, and of every State of the Commonwealth, that a period of seven years after the author's death should be the alternative to a fixed period of forty-two years. By leave of the Committee, I will temporarily withdraw my amendment, in order to allow Senator Symon to move the amendment he has indicated.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I wish to emphasize something which Senator Givens has been saying. We know by experience that it frequently happens that when a prominent author dies a very great demand arises for his books. At the present time we have before us an illustration of the sudden demand which may arise for the works of an author on his death. Several years ago a celebrated book was published, and when the author died the other day a great demand for it arose at home. I refer to Shorthouse's John Inglesant. It is what is called a philosophical romance, and there is a very great demand for that work at present.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Copyright in John Inglesant has not yet expired.

Senator WALKER.—I am aware of that, as the book was published in 1881. But a new demand for the book has arisen since the death of the author. Senator Smith made a remark to the effect that Charles Lamb had died 100 years ago, and that new "Letters of Elia" had been discovered recently, for which there would be forty-two years' copyright. I refreshed my memory on the subject, and I find that Charles Lamb died in 1834, only seventy-one years ago. I should not like it to go abroad that we all think a man died 100 years ago who died less than seventy-two years ago. We know that towards the end of an author's life he often publishes his autobiography, and it would be rather unfortunate if his family at his death should not be able to secure any benefit from such a work. I hope that Senator Givens' suggested amendment will be carried, and that the period fixed will be forty-two years, or the life of the author and seven years.

Amendment (by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) proposed—

That all the words after the word "of," line 4, be left out with a view to insert in lieu thereof the following words—"forty-two years, or for the author's life, whichever shall last the longer."

Amendment of the amendment (by Senator GIVENS) proposed—

That after the word "life" the words "and seven years" be inserted.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I have been very much astonished, especially by the conduct of my honorable friends on my right in making such a determined assault on what must, I think, be considered the sacred rights of property. I always understood those honorable senators to be determined defenders of those rights. Is not a book which a man writes his own property, the product of his own brain? That being the case, should he not have full possession of it during his lifetime, and be in a position to bequeath any benefits arising from it to his posterity?

Senator MILLEN.—For ever?

Senator STEWART.—Yes, for ever. If Senator Millen acquired a landed estate, he would call it confiscation if any one attempted to take it from him during his life, and if the honorable senator were not permitted to hand it down to his children after his death, no one would be louder in protest than he would. The production of a book is just as much the product of an individual's brain and energy as is the building up of a fortune.

Senator FINDLEY.—Would the honorable senator apply the same line of reasoning to all patents?

Senator STEWART.—I am not very sure that I would not. I do not see how we can deprive a man of one particular kind of property, whilst another form of property is looked upon as sacred. The only gleam of satisfaction I have in connexion with the whole matter, is that we have an admission from honorable senators on this side of the Chamber, that even property is not to be looked upon as sacred.

Senator MILLEN.—And an admission from the honorable senator that certain forms of property are sacred.

Senator STEWART.—And that it must give way to the interests or desires of the community. I welcome that admission very heartily. If we live sufficiently long we may ask these honorable senators to apply this newly-found principle in some other direction, when I trust we shall have their support as freely as it is given on the present occasion.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator is dissenting from that principle.

Senator STEWART.—I find that the Committee is unanimous, and mine is the only voice raised in defence of property. On this occasion I am "a voice crying in the wilderness." There is not much use in my protesting against what is being done, as I find that the great majority of honorable senators are anxious to limit an author's right to the production of his own brain. Some honorable senators would do that during his life, and all of them would appear to be prepared to limit the interests of his children in an author's work. As the Committee seems determined to take this course I can only acquiesce.

ADJOURNMENT.

KALGOORLIE TO PORT AUGUSTA RAILWAY SURVEY.

Motion (by Senator PLAYFORD) proposed—

That the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—During the recent debate on the Bill to authorize the survey of the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta railway, repeated assertions were made as regards the attitude adopted by the Government of South Australia. Both the Age and the Argus of to-day contain a statement by the Premier of that State. The one in the Age reads as follows:—

THE DESERT RAILWAY. SOUTH AUSTRALIA'S ENGAGEMENT.

ADELAIDE, Tuesday.

Mr. V. L. Solomon asked the Premier, referring to a statement made by members of the Federal Parliament, "that South Australia had given a solemn guarantee to authorize by Act of Parliament the construction of a line of railway from Port Augusta to the Western Australia border," whether such a statement was in accordance with fact, and if there was the slightest warrant for such assertion.

Mr. Price replied:—"On 1st February, 1900, the then Premier (Mr. F. W. Holder) undertook, as soon as Federation was established, to introduce a Bill formally giving the assent of this State to the construction of the line by Federal authority, and to pass it stage by stage simultaneously with the passage of a similar Bill through the Western Australian Parliament. This had (11th June, 1901) the support of the Jenkins Government, conditionally upon the line joining the Western Australian one forty to sixty miles north of Eucla. In 1903 the Premier (Mr. Jenkins), while on a visit to Western Australia, personally promised to introduce an Enabling Bill, but with the further stipulation that the powers conferred upon the Federal Parliament should be exercised within a period of three years. Again (29th June, 1903), Mr. Jenkins promised to bring in a Bill for the construction of the line, subject to Western Australia passing an Act indemnifying South Australia against any financial loss for ten years from the completion, with a stipulation as to 3½ ft. gauge, and for the line to go through Tarcoola to Port Augusta. This indemnity was offered by the Premier of Western Australia on 26th June, 1903."

It was repeatedly hurled at us by the opponents of the measure that we had no authority for the statement we made.

Senator MILLEN.—Where is the authority now?

Senator PEARCE.—The authority is the Premier of South Australia.

Senator MILLEN.—Where?

Senator PEARCE.—The authority I have quoted.

Senator MILLEN.—That is merely a statement that several Premiers have promised to do things which they did not do.

Senator DOBSON.—We want an Act of Parliament.

Senator PEARCE.—On page 966 of Hansard, Senator Dobson said the Parliament was not asked to do the business in a proper manner, and that the consent of the State concerned ought to be obtained before a shilling was spent on the railway.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator ought not to refer to a former debate of the present session.

Senator PEARCE.—If I am out of order, sir, in making this reference, of course I must bow to your ruling. My object in raising this question now is to show that not only were we within our rights in making the statement we did, but that the Premier of South Australia who, so far as I know, is not friendly to this project, has publicly, in his own Parliament, recognised and placed on record these pledges in answer to the question challenging the right of honorable senators here to make the statement they did.

Senator DOBSON.—I read all that in the correspondence; but what we wanted was an Act of Parliament.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable and learned senator not only asked for an Act of Parliament, but strenuously contended that South Australia had in no way offered us any inducement.

Senator DOBSON.—In a proper way!

Senator PEARCE.—I read this report in order to show that the present Premier of South Australia recognises that an inducement was held out to us by the Premier of that State prior to Federation, and also by his successor; that a definite promise was made by each Premier that a Bill would be introduced, and the statement made yesterday by the present Premier fully justifies the statements which were made here by the senators for Western Australia, and challenged by honorable senators on the other side.

Senator DOBSON.—That extract does not alter the position one iota.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland). — We must all admire the energy and perseverance of our honorable friend. But I see nothing in the evidence so called that he has produced, as to a pledge by South Australia. No doubt a pledge was given by Sir Frederick Holder when Premier of the State, and, perhaps, by his successor, Mr. Jenkins, and others.

Senator GUTHRIE.—But Mr. Jenkins' pledges were conditional.

Senator HIGGS.—Yes, they were. These promises, if put to the test in the Parliament of South Australia, might meet with the same fate as the promise of Mr. Deakin when Prime Minister, that if he could help it he would not allow civil servants to be included in the operation of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill.

Senator MILLEN.—But they did not intend to carry out their promise.

Senator HIGGS.—One might just as well claim that Sir John Forrest's statement that the contribution of Australia to the British Navy ought to be £5,000,000 per year, expresses the opinion of Australia on that question.

Senator PEARCE.—Is the honorable senator aware that Senator Dobson said that if we were to send men to make the survey they would be summoned for trespassing?

Senator DOBSON.—I said they could be summoned.

Senator PEARCE.—Not that they could, but that they would be summoned.

Senator HIGGS.—The point of the honorable senator is that South Australia pledged herself to carry out a certain work, and the only evidence in support thereof is the word of Sir Frederick Holder and other persons, which, in his opinion, may amount to evidence, but which I do not think amounts to very much.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I should like to remind Senator Pearce of this fact that, in spite of all the evidence he brings that certain persons holding public positions did make promises, one of them, Mr. Jenkins, laid it down in a public document that no promise could be binding unless it was contained in an Act of Parliament. That seems to me to sum up the whole position—that one of these gentlemen, whose individual promise is relied upon, has candidly told us and Australia, "You must not take my promise as binding; no promise except that contained in a resolution of Parliament can be held to be binding."

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Senate adjourned at 10.1 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 13 September, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

QUEENSLAND SHIPPING CONTRACT.

Mr. CULPIN.—I wish to know from the Prime Minister, in reference to a statement published in to-day's Argus, if he has heard from the Premier of Queensland in reference to the contract entered into by that State with the Orient Steamship Company?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I received a copy of the contract this morning.

SHIPPING SERVICE COMMITTEE.

Motion (by Mr. THOMAS) agreed to—

That the Select Committee on the shipping service between the Commonwealth and the United Kingdom have power to report the minutes of evidence from time to time.

PAPER.

Mr. DEAKIN laid upon the table the following paper:—

Correspondence relating to the Immigration Restriction Act.

COST OF MAIL-BAGS.

Mr. THOMAS asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. What is the cost per 1,000 of the D iron rings which are attached to mail-bags in New South Wales?
2. What is the cost per yard of canvas used in making mail-bags in the same State?
3. What is the cost (labour only) of making 3, 4, 5, and 6 feet bags?
4. How many bags were made each year during the past five years?
5. What is the cost of having the name of the State printed on bags?
6. How many seals are in use throughout the State of New South Wales for sealing mail-bags?
7. What is the average cost per seal?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Inquiries are being made, and replies will be furnished as early as possible.

NORTH BRIGHTON POST-OFFICE.

Mr. TUDOR asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Whether he will give the House the following information:—

1. What is the amount of allowance paid to the man in charge of the post-office at North Brighton, Victoria?
2. What amount of business has to be done by an allowance post-office before it is turned into an official post-office?
3. How many post-offices are worked on the allowance system in Victoria?
4. How many post-offices are worked on the allowance system in each of the other States?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Inquiries are being made, and replies will be furnished as early as possible.

REPRESENTATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed from 8th September (vide page 2082), on motion by Mr. GROOM—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I suppose that we are all agreed that a measure of this kind, affecting as it does the representation of the States in this House of the Federal Parliament, is not only of interest to honorable members, but of interest and considerable importance to the public at large. I do not agree with the view which has been expressed that it is immaterial from what States representation comes, because on many large questions differences of opinion will inevitably be caused by the differences of opinion in the States from which members come, since electors will select as their representatives men who hold their views. I had not the pleasure of hearing the speech delivered by the Minister of Home Affairs in moving the second reading of the Bill, but, thanks to his courtesy, I had an early opportunity to peruse the official report of it, and perhaps I may be permitted, without presumption, to express my disappointment with it, for two reasons: First, because—with every respect to the honorable and learned gentleman—he seems to me to have passed by, rather than to have met, the main legal difficulties connected with this subject; and, secondly, because he refrained from giving the House any information whatever as to what the practical working out of the Government proposals would mean. Both those matters seem to me of great importance, as to which the House had a right to hear from the Minister, and I regret that he did not think fit to deal with them. As a representative of Victoria, I feel that I have a somewhat more special interest in this measure than have the representatives of other States, because Victoria is threatened with a diminished representation as the result of its operation. As one of the three Victorian Ministers in the last Cabinet, which was concerned in coming to a decision of some importance with regard to redistribution, and was subjected to very severe criticism in consequence of the action it proposed to take, I feel it my duty in discussing this measure to place some of the facts connected with the situation before the House; and I hope that I may be so far favoured as to have the substance of my remarks placed before the country, in order that the public may know what the facts were which the late Government, and this Government, too, have had to deal with in considering the question. I use the word “facts” advisedly, in contrast with some of the words of vaguer meaning which have been employed in connexion with this matter during the last month or two.

Mr. MAHON.—“Guesses” the Argus calls them this morning.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes. I shall refer to facts. I should like, in the first place, to remind honorable members very briefly of the history of section 24 of the Constitution, under which the Bill is introduced. The Minister of Home Affairs, in quoting what purport to be precedents in the draft Constitution Bill of 1891, the Canadian Constitution, and the Constitution of the United States, appeared to have lost sight of the fundamental difference between those provisions and the section in the Constitution under which we are living, and under which he has taken action. The draft Constitution Bill prepared by the Convention of 1891 very specifically laid down the periods at which redistribution was to take place. It provided that a fresh apportionment of representatives to the States should be made after each census of the people of the Commonwealth, which should be taken at intervals not longer than ten years. The Canadian Constitution, and the Constitution of the United States, in like manner provide for the ascertainment of the population for the purpose of altering representation on a census. But the Convention which framed the Constitution under which we are now living departed from the form of phraseology used in those Constitutions, and did so deliberately. It provided that the number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of the people, and determined in a certain manner, involving the ascertainment, not of the number of the people determined by a census, but of the number of the people determined by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth. I propose to refer briefly, a little later on, to what may be meant by the words “the latest statistics of the Commonwealth,” and merely point out in passing the great difference in phraseology between our Constitution and those to which the Minister has alluded.

Mr. GLYNN.—We can alter the arrangement by this very Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—I am not at all sure that we can; but I shall come to that matter later on. Our Constitution uses the words, “latest statistics of the Commonwealth,” instead of the word “census,” which has a definite and ascertained meaning. In 1903, a redistribution of seats was proposed in this House, and last year it was still recognised, not only by the Government of the day, but by all parties, that, in view of the great disparity between the actual numbers of electors in the various electorates, and the limits allowed by the Electoral Act, a redistribution of seats was necessary at an early date, and certainly before the next general election. The Electoral Act allows a margin of one-fifth either way, though, as I have stated on previous occasions, I should have preferred a margin of at least one-fourth.

Knowing that the electorates, so far from differing only in the maximum proportion of six to four, differ in some cases in the proportion of more than two to one, Parliament thought that a redistribution must, in fairness, take place.

Mr. TUDOR.—In some cases the difference is three to one.

Mr. McCAY.—At any rate, it is more than two to one. First, the Barton Government, and then the Reid-McLean Government, undertook to arrange for a redistribution. This redistribution was pressed for last session by a number of those who sat in opposition to the Reid-McLean Administration. That Government, with the approval of the House, undertook definitely—as it undertook a number of things definitely, though it had not had an opportunity to carry them into effect—to be ready with a redistribution proposal when Parliament met this session. During the recess, in pursuance of their promise, they took steps towards proceeding with the redistribution. The first duty they had to perform was to ascertain the respective positions of the States. They had to look into legal questions, and into facts, in order to be able to direct the Commissioners of the various States as to how many electorates each State should be divided into. Through making these inquiries, the late Government became cognizant of certain facts. They became cognizant of the fact that the population of Victoria had not been increasing in the same ratio, so far as the statisticians' estimates guided us, as the population of the other States—that while the quota to determine the number of members was increasing, the population of Victoria was not increasing in the same ratio, and, consequently, if the statisticians' figures were to be accepted as correct, Victoria's representation was diminishing. Then the Government had to consider the question how to deal with this fact. It was pressed by the knowledge that it was bound to be in a reasonable state of preparedness when it met Parliament, and accordingly an Order in Council was passed, and a Gazette notice was published, declaring that the population of the various States, as on 31st December, 1904, consisted of certain numbers, and that those numbers were to be the basis upon which were to be determined the number of representatives of the States. That action of the late Administration, in declaring these figures by Executive act to be the basis of calculation, was most seriously challenged in many quarters. That Government had not, however, acted without precedent. In the Commonwealth Gazette of 13th June, 1903—a few months prior to the distribution of the seats under the last distribution schemes, and the presentation to the House of those schemes, which were for the most part rejected, and during the administration of the Barton Government, in which the present Prime Minister was Attorney-General, the present Minister of Trade and Customs was Minister of Home Affairs, and of which the Treasurer was also a member—the following Order in Council appeared:—

Official return of the population of the Commonwealth upon which to determine the number of members of the House of Representatives to be returned by each State.

His Excellency the Governor-General in and over the Commonwealth of Australia, by and with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, has been pleased to approve that, for the purpose of determining the quota upon which to base the number of members to be returned by each State to the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Australia, in accordance with section 24 of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, the return of population as stated hereunder be recognised as the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

Population of the six States of the Commonwealth, according to the latest official statistics (31st December, 1902).

Then followed the figures, and the order was signed by "Wm. John Lyne, Minister of State for Home Affairs." That was the precedent, and, more than that, it was a precedent with which not a soul in this House or outside of it quarrelled. It could not be pretended that honorable members had no knowledge of the matter.

Mr. MAHON.—Was an election pending then?

Mr. McCAY.—Yes, in December of that year.

Mr. MAHON.—Then the fact that it was passed without any observation becomes all the worse.

Mr. McCAY.—More than that, there was a debate in this House when the whole matter was brought up.

Mr. GROOM.—Upon what question?

Mr. McCAY.—In connexion with the question of the exclusion of certain aliens from the calculation of the population of Queensland.

Mr. GROOM.—The discussion took place on that question only.

Mr. McCAY.—I propose to quote certain remarks that were made during that debate by the present Minister of Home Affairs, who in his speech referred to the ascertainment of the figures by the States Statisticians, and asked the then Minister of Home Affairs whether the figures supplied by the various States were calculated on the same basis.

Mr. GROOM.—That is correct.

Mr. McCAY.—At page 2952 of vol. XV. of Hansard the present Minister of Home Affairs said—

If the Minister of Home Affairs, upon investigation, discovers that, in making their computation, the statisticians have not adopted a uniform basis, I think that he should instruct them to do so, with a view to definitely settling the matter without delay.

That referred to all the figures used and to the calculations which were challenged on the ground that certain aliens were wrongly counted in some cases. The whole matter came under consideration, and the then Minister of Home Affairs made the position perfectly clear in the remarks which I am about to quote. He was followed by the present Prime Minister, then Attorney-General, who did not raise any question as to the propriety of the figures, although the then Minister of Home Affairs dealt with them specifically. At page 2957 the present Minister of Trade and Customs is reported as having said—

The figures given in it must be regarded not as State, but as Commonwealth, figures. . . . I am now speaking upon a technical point, which was brought under my notice by the much-abused electoral officer, Mr. Lewis, that sub-section 1 of section 24 of the Commonwealth Act required that the statistics used should be the statistics of the Commonwealth. I informed him that these figures were prepared by a statistician who was acting for the Commonwealth, and that they were therefore officially compiled for our purposes.

No one took exception to that statement. At page 2959 he went on to say—

I have acted carefully and upon the best advice that could be obtained.

I presume that that was the advice of the then Attorney-General. He continued—

I have adopted the figures relating to population which were supplied to the Department of Home Affairs by the statisticians of the States.

These figures were accepted and were submitted to the Cabinet, and gazetted, and not a word of objection was raised. Further on, the present Minister of Trade and Customs said—

I cannot do other than rely upon the figures supplied by the statisticians.

On the very figures which are now called mere estimates and guesses, and stated to be absolutely unreliable, the Barton Government proposed a redistribution of seats in this House.

Mr. GROOM.—They did not propose to take any action—none was necessary.

Mr. McCAY.—The figures showed that there was no necessity for any alteration in the number of representatives of the States, but that does not alter the fact that they were adopted as the basis upon which the number of members was to be calculated, and that they were gazetted before the redistribution was entered upon. Does the Minister mean to say that we are not to quarrel with the figures so long as they do not require us to make an alteration? No alteration in the number of representatives was proposed, because the statistics showed that none was required; but the Government did not retain the old number of representatives irrespective of the figures supplied by the statisticians. On the other hand, they accepted the figures, and based their calculations upon them. Therefore, so far as precedent is concerned, the late Administration had the best precedent.

Mr. GLYNN.—The honorable and learned member might call it the worst precedent.

Mr. McCAY.—Perhaps I shall arrive in time at the point which the honorable and learned member has in his mind. There was more than that to consider. The existence of a precedent was not a sufficient justification for any Administration in pursuing a course which it thought to be wrong, and the then Government, like the present one, had to consider the legal position. Section 24 of the Constitution provides that—

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the Commonwealth, and the number of such members shall be, as nearly as practicable, twice the number of senators.

The number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people—

That cannot be altered by Parliament. There is no "until Parliament otherwise provides" preceding that provision. It is distinctly provided that the number of members chosen shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of the people. Then the section proceeds—and shall, until the Parliament otherwise provides, be determined whenever necessary in the following manner—

That manner requires the ascertainment of the number of people of the Commonwealth, "as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth." The section begins by providing that the number of members chosen—that means at an election—shall be in proportion to the people of the States. That is an absolute direction that cannot be altered by this Parliament. But we are told that we can provide a method other than that set forth in the Constitution for determining the number of the people in the States, and the number of members by a mere arithmetical calculation based on the number of people in the States. It is provided that until that is done—and that is the present position—the number shall be determined whenever necessary. One has to ask the meaning of the words "whenever necessary." Do they mean whenever Parliament thinks necessary? That is one view taken of this section. I cannot agree with that view. My opinion may not be a solid or a sound one, but that is the conclusion at which I have arrived. I doubt whether, upon the mere construction of the words "whenever necessary," they mean anything else, but "whenever the actual number of the people renders the operation necessary." That is to say, whenever the numbers of the people vary so as to require variations in the number of representatives. It is urged by Quick and Garran, and it is hinted, although not stated, by the Minister of Home Affairs, that these words "whenever necessary" mean whenever it is convenient in the view of the Parliament. I trust that that is the correct view, because otherwise I am afraid the Bill now before us may be challenged as being in contravention of the Constitution. But my own opinion is that the words mean whenever the number of members is not in proportion to the number of people, in accordance with the earlier provision in the section. Therefore, it appears to me—and it appeared to the members of the late Government in the same way—that under a strict interpretation of the Constitution this provision is almost automatic in its operation; that as the population varies the number of members ought to vary also. Parliament can, of course, refrain from performing its duty, but if it discharges its full responsibility it will have to vary the number of members as the number of people in the States vary. If that is what is meant by the section, it will prove highly inconvenient. The fixing of periodic dates seems to be the only convenient method of proceeding, and a very strong argument against the view I have been stating may be advanced on the ground that the Constitution could not mean anything so inconvenient as what I have suggested. In order to uphold that objection, however, a Court would have to come to the conclusion that the Constitution did not say what it meant, and did not mean what it said. That is practically the position that Courts sometimes have to assume, in the interpretation of statutes, but it is a position that they take up only as a last resort. Then the Government had to decide what were the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, because, even if the number of people in the States had actually varied, their number could not be determined according to the Constitution if the latest statistics of the Commonwealth were not ascertainable. I should like to point out, in passing, that it does not suggest that the matter should be determined by Parliament—that it should not be an Executive Act—which was the view taken by the Barton Government when by Executive act it determined the number of members. The next question is: "What are the latest statistics of the Commonwealth," because if no numbers are ascertained, according to these "latest statistics"—it does not matter what are the actual numbers—there can be no re-allotment of members. Roughly speaking, I may say that the view put forward by those who criticise the action of the late Government was that the "latest statistics of the Commonwealth" meant the latest statistics ascertained by the Commonwealth. That, however, is not what the Constitution says. My own opinion is that those words mean the latest statistics relating to the Commonwealth, and, in proof of my contention, I venture to submit one or two arguments which might not be admissible in a court of law, but which are nevertheless proper arguments to submit in this House. In the first place, the Constitution Bill of 1891, the Canadian Constitution, and the United States Constitution all specifically refer to "census" as contrasted with "statistics" in this section. In the second place, I find that clause 26 of the Commonwealth Constitution Bill, in the form in which it went to England to be adopted by the Imperial Parliament, instead of setting out the numbers of members as they now appear in our Constitution Act, contained a few words in brackets and in italics to the effect that they were to be determined "according to the latest returns at the passing of the Act." There were some interesting references made to this matter in the Convention debates. From the official report of the debates in the Adelaide Convention, I find that Sir Edmund Barton said—

The number of members to be chosen by each State shall be as follows:—that is, to be determined according to latest statistical returns at the passing of the Act.

Throughout the Convention discussions the right honorable member for Balaclava and the present Attorney-General time after time drew attention to what would happen to a State like Victoria owing to the operation of this provision. They directed attention to the fact that its inevitable result would be that unless the population of Victoria grew to an extent equal to the average growth of Australia, its representation would dwindle and dwindle.

Mr. ISAACS.—We tried to alter that provision.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes; but the honorable and learned gentleman and those who supported him did not succeed. That is my point. At the Melbourne Convention, as will be seen by reference to page 1838 of the official report, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, in discussing what is now section 26 of the Constitution is reported to have said—

At what stage is it proposed to have the gap filled up? Is it before this Bill is sent home or afterwards?

Mr. O'CONNOR.—It is to be filled up according to the latest statistical returns, at the date of the passing of the Act by the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS.—You leave it for the Imperial Parliament to fill in the gap?

Mr. O'CONNOR.—Undoubtedly. The figures may change in the meantime.

The words "statistical returns" are used there, and the word "statistics" is employed in section 24, whereas the term "census" is used in the draft Constitution Bill of 1891, in the Canadian Act, and also in the United States Constitution. I venture to say without any hesitation that whatever the term "Commonwealth statistics" in section 24 may mean, it means something more than the word "census"—something less definite, less certain, if honorable members choose—but something different from the word "census," with its well-ascertained meaning. Consequently, I hold that the "latest statistics of the Commonwealth" are not synonymous merely with the census returns. The word "census" was deliberately abandoned by the framers of our Constitution. Under sub-section 11 of section 51 of the Constitution, the Commonwealth is empowered, amongst other subjects, to make laws in regard to "census and statistics." In that provision "census" is again differentiated from "statistics."

Mr. HIGGINS.—Because we may have statistics which relate to goods as well as to men.

Mr. McCAY.—I am perfectly well aware of that. I do not base the whole of my argument upon the meaning of those words in that sub-section. That is merely one of the many straws which show the way in which the current is flowing. I contend that the circumstance to which I have referred shows that "statistics" are something different from an actual enumeration of the people. The present Government entertains the same view as did the recent Administration. When we recollect all that was said by some honorable members, including the Attorney-General, in regard to the Bill which the late Government intended to submit, I say that the action of that Administration finds complete justification in the measure which is now under consideration. The Attorney-General finds salvation in an Act of Parliament, as contrasted with an Executive act. If the thing be done by Act of Parliament, his contention is that the figures are all right, but if it be done by Executive act, they are all wrong. This Bill is intended to accomplish two things. First of all, it deals with the present position, and in the second place, it deals with future matters. The late Administration recognised, just as well as does the present Government, that as regards the future, it was desirable to pass some Act—if the law permitted it—in order to arrange for periodical revisions, rather than for revisions which might take place at any time. They were dealing with the present situation as well. As to the present, I hold that the statistics of the Commonwealth are not confined to the census returns. The variations of language afford a strong argument in that direction. What is the meaning of the term "statistics of the Commonwealth"? Does it mean "statistics ascertained by the Commonwealth"? With every respect I say that that seems to me an unworthy argument. It suggests that the signature of the Chief Electoral Officer attached to returns of population under the provisions of a Commonwealth statute will make the figures which they contain right when they are not right. It evidences a trust in the signature of that officer as a miracle worker—a trust which I do not possess. Either the figures are right or they are wrong. If they are wrong, the signature of the Chief Electoral Officer will not make them right. In the remarks which I have quoted in regard to section 26 of the Constitution Mr. O'Connor pointed out that the figures might change between the periods of the passing of the Bill by the Convention and its being passed by the Imperial Parliament. As a matter of fact, the Statisticians' "guesses," as they are called, were accepted for the original representation of the States.

Mr. GLYNN.—They were not embodied in the Constitution.

Mr. McCAY.—The figures with which some honorable members have quarrelled were those which were used in connexion with the first Federal election. In my judgment, the term, "statistics of the Commonwealth," does not mean statistics ascertained by the Commonwealth, but actual figures of Commonwealth population. In other words, it means statistics relating to the Commonwealth. The word "of" is ambiguous—it may mean half-a-dozen things. I freely admit that it is a question which is open to argument. But presuming that the late Government were wrong in their view, and that a Bill was necessary to validate the whole matter, surely it was entitled to assume that the necessary legal authority would be given by this Parliament. I take the view, however, that no legal authority is necessary to meet the present situation. The matter was very fully considered, and, rightly or wrongly, we came to that conclusion. I now wish to deal with the facts, as they are at present, relating to the representation of the States, and in this connexion I propose to give some figures. I shall give the figures which faced the recent Administration and those which confront the present Government in dealing with the matter. In the first place, I say that, so far as this Bill deals with the immediate necessities of the situation—with the redistribution that it proposes shall take place before the next general election—there is not a figure or a fact different from the figures and facts which were used by the late Government. The present Administration, in submitting this Bill, and in declaring, in paragraph 2 of clause 3, that—

The first enumeration day shall be appointed as soon as practicable after the commencement of this Act, admit that they are going to accept those figures. In effect, they say, "We are going to accept the Statisticians' estimates with the possibilities of error—indeed, everything which our predecessors proposed to accept." If we turn to Schedule A, and look at all the calculations, and the allowances for unrecorded arrivals and departures, which require to be made, it will be seen that every one of those are allowances actually being made at the present time by the Statistician of every State Government. Indeed, the provision has been adopted verbatim from the report of the conference of the Statisticians of the States which met in 1903. They are better figures than those upon which the Barton Government acted, because the latter were not uniform.

Mr. GROOM.—In 1903 it was want of uniformity which gave rise to the criticism which was indulged in by honorable members of this House.

Mr. McCAY.—It was much more than that. Let the Minister of Home Affairs read the speech delivered by his present colleague, the Minister of Trade and Customs, and the Gazette notice. He deliberately accepted the Statisticians' figures. If the only thing to which objection was raised in 1903 was want of uniformity, why was the action of the last Government, in basing their action upon uniformity, challenged? I repeat that the very allowances set out in the schedule are those upon which all the States Statisticians proceeded, and in accordance with which they have revised the whole of their figures since the census of 1901. I say at once as a Victorian member that I scrutinized the proposals of the late Government with jealous suspicion. If I could honestly have found any reasonable cause to object to those proposals, which meant depriving Victoria of one representative, I most certainly should have objected to them. It was not until an overwhelming and irresistible mass of facts confronted us that the honorable member for Gippsland, the right honorable member for Balaclava, and myself gave way. We could not help ourselves any more than the present Government can help themselves. The Minister of Home Affairs, the Attorney-General, and the Prime Minister know perfectly well that if this Bill becomes law and an enumeration day is appointed, Victoria will have only twenty-two representatives in this House. I am very sorry that it is so.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Why should the honorable and learned member be sorry?

Mr. McCAY.—I am sorry that Victoria is to lose any of her representation.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Victoria ought to lose one representative.

Mr. McCAY.—I regret that the State of Victoria is not progressing as fast as are the other States.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable and learned member is sorry that the State of Victoria is not progressing more rapidly.

Mr. McCAY.—I am sorry that Victoria is not progressing rapidly enough to enable her to retain her representation. If, upon the facts presented to me, any reasonable ground for questioning the accuracy of the figures existed, or if there had been any reasonable doubt as to whether Victoria should, or should not, retain twenty-three representatives in this House, I should have given this State the benefit of the doubt. But the Victorian members of the late Government exercised all the care that they could. First of all, the question arose as to whether the estimates were based upon this uniform scheme. Then we relied upon the Victorian Statistician for all our figures and references. Before we consented to the proposal to reduce Victoria's representation to twenty-two members, the then Treasurer, the right honorable member for Balaclava, put a specific question to the Victorian Government Statistician, as to whether any error, likely to have occurred, could place Victoria in the position of being entitled to twenty-three members. The Government Statistician replied, however, in even a more emphatic way than that in which the question was put. On the 20th March of this year, in a letter to the then Treasurer, he wrote—

I do not think that any error—

there is no question of its being any error “likely to occur” — which may have occurred will entitle Victoria to twenty-three members.

The facts before us showed that that was so, but we desired something more—we wished to obtain the assurance of the Government expert on the point. In the face of this letter, and having regard to the figures which we had worked out for ourselves, we felt that we were honestly called upon to give effect to the proper facts, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. I wish now to refer to remarks made in the course of press interviews by the present Attorney-General and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. On the 6th April last, the Age newspaper opened the ball with the statement that—

In proposing, on the strength of mere statistical guesswork, to deprive Victoria of a seat in the House of Representatives, the Federal Ministry is exposing itself to the certainty of being rebuked by the Federal Parliament.

It went on to declare that the section of the Constitution governing the question meant that the decennial census returns should be taken. I do not know whether the sudden defeat of the late Government was really the rebuke prophesied by the Age, but the question was revived in May last, when Mr. Irvine — a distinguished member of the State Parliament — expressed the opinion that the only basis of calculation was an enumeration of the population—in other words, that there must be a “census,” in the ordinary acceptance of the word. The present Attorney-General, the honorable and learned member for Indi, also gave an opinion which was characterized by his usual caution. He said that first of all Parliament had to determine whenever a redistribution was necessary. I beg leave to doubt the accuracy of that contention. He went on to say that, as regards that section of the Constitution which deals with the taking over of the States debts in proportion to the “population statistics of the Commonwealth,” the words “Statistics of the Commonwealth” could not refer to some hazy indefinite estimate. But the words “Statistics of the Commonwealth” must have been used in the same sense in the finance clause of the Constitution, as they were in section 24, which relates to the question now before us. The present Attorney-General described the figures which his Government have now accepted as a mere—hazy, indefinite estimate made at the request of the Minister of some Department, and wholly unprovided for by law.

The estimates are made regularly by the Statisticians of the States, and are supplied at the request of the Minister; but it cannot be said that they are "made" at the request of a Minister, and are wholly unprovided for by law. It seems that the magic of an Act of Parliament is to change wrong figures into right figures—is to transform "hazy, indefinite estimates" into accurate figures on which the representation of the States is to be determined. The Attorney-General went on to say that until Commonwealth officers are "authorized to obtain, and do obtain, proper information," this cannot be done. What is "proper information"? Here, again, we have the ægis of an Act of Parliament. The figures for our guidance will be the same after this measure has been passed as they were before. We shall have the same figures collected by the same persons on the same basis, and subject to the same allowances as before. The Attorney-General continued—

What has Mr. Topp to turn to as "latest statistics"? They are merely estimates by the State Statisticians—apparently under State laws—and afterwards adopted by the Federal Executive Council.

To paraphrase the words of the honorable and learned gentleman, I shall say that the figures dealt with by this measure are merely estimates of the States Statisticians, apparently under State laws, and that they are now to be adopted by the Federal Parliament. Nevertheless, the fact remains that they are still mere estimates by the States Statisticians—that they are absolutely the same as before. I come now to the opinion expressed by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, who, to use a vulgarism, "went the whole hog," declaring that the term "statistics of the Commonwealth" meant a census.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I did not say so.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable and learned member said that it meant a systematic enumeration of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Exactly.

Mr. McCAY.—Then what did the honorable and learned member mean if he did not intend to convey that an actual count should be made?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I did not speak of a census, and I would ask the honorable and learned member to keep to the expression that he first used.

Mr. McCAY.—I have used the word "census" all through in the sense of an actual count. I notice that in giving the opinion to which I have referred, the honorable and learned member looked up the dictionary for the definition of the word "statistics." I should like him to tell us what is the meaning of the word "enumeration." When he used that word, did he refer to an estimate, or an actual count? If he meant an actual count, then he was really referring to a census in the sense that I have been using that word. If, on the other hand, he was referring to a calculation, and thinks that figures are good when authorized by a Federal law, but bad when authorized only by an act of the Federal Executive, I repeat that here again he is sacrificing the substance for the shadow. He is assuming that bad figures may be made good by an Act of Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN.—They may be wrong; but the Bill is simply introduced to make them right.

Mr. McCAY.—I was referring, not to the terms of the Bill, but to the opinion expressed by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, who holds that the latest statistics mean the latest systematic enumeration of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth. He does not say that that enumeration shall be authorized by Federal law. I come now to certain figures that I desire to lay before the House. Let me begin by quoting those relating to the estimated population of Australia on 31st December, 1904. These were the latest that could be obtained by the Government of the day in March last, when they entered upon the consideration of this question. The present Attorney-General, in the course of a press interview, asked why the late Government selected the figures for the 31st December, 1904, and went on to say, "There must have been some reason for it." The reason was that they were the latest available when the late Government dealt with the matter. We had to begin to consider the matter before May, in order that it might be settled by that date. The present Attorney-General suggested that there must have been some occult reason for selecting the figures for 31st December last, and apparently the inference was that Victoria was to suffer by their adoption, in preference to the selection of those for March, 1905. I shall show whether or not there is any warrant for that implication. On 31st December, 1904, the effective population of the Commonwealth—and by “effective population,” I mean the population excluding full-blooded aborigines and aliens disqualified under certain sections of the Commonwealth Constitution Act—according to the estimates of the Statisticians, was 3,951,829. Dividing that total by 72, we get as the quota, 54,886, and the half quota is thus 27,443. Dividing the population of New South Wales, which was estimated at 1,457,246, by the quota, it was found to be entitled to twenty-six full members, and to have a balance of 30,210 persons, or 2,767 more than half the quota, so that she was thus entitled to twenty-seven members. I may say, in passing, that the fact that New South Wales was to gain a representative had nothing to do with the fact that Victoria was to lose one. Victoria might lose a representative without New South Wales gaining one, and New South Wales might lose a representative without Victoria gaining one. Victoria's population of 1,210,304, divided by the quota, gave her twenty-two members, with a balance of 2,812 persons, or 24,631 short of the half quota that would entitle her to a twenty-third member. But even if Victoria had had 24,631 more than she was shown by this estimate to have, she still would have been entitled to only twenty-two members, unless the population of the other States had been over-estimated to that extent, because, by adding 24,631 persons to the total population of the Commonwealth, we should thereby increase the quota, making the remainder, after dividing by the quota, less than half the quota. If Victoria had had the additional 24,631 persons, she would not have been entitled to more than 22'30 representatives. Assuming that the population of the other States was correct, and that that of Victoria alone was under-estimated, in order to have twenty-three members she would have required to have, in addition to her estimated population, no less than 35,836 people. These were the facts that faced the late Administration when they dealt with this matter. No member of the late Government rejoiced at the prospect of Victoria losing one of its representatives—I do not think that any one would do so—but that was the fact that faced us. What possible errors could creep in to lead us to suppose that the estimate was so far out as has been suggested? The Statisticians of Victoria and New South Wales were wrong in their estimates between 1891 and 1901. But to what extent? The New South Wales census of 1901 showed that her Statistician had over-estimated her population by 12,000, while the Victorian census of that year showed that the population of this State had been under-estimated by 10,000. If between April, 1901, and December, 1904—a period of three and a half years—the Statisticians were as far out in their calculations as they were in respect of the whole of the preceding ten years, the population of Victoria would still have been 20,000 less than the number entitling her to twenty-three representatives. We must not forget, however, that during the three and a half years which I have mentioned, the Statisticians in question had adopted a new allowance, based on the errors disclosed by the preceding census, so that their estimates were more likely to be correct.

Mr. WILKS.—I hope that the honorable and learned member has not made a mistake.

Mr. McCAY.—I certainly have not. The next point which the late Government had to consider was as to the allowances made. It was thought that possibly the errors in regard to the three and a half years period, which I have named, were larger than were those for the preceding ten years, and, having regard to that possibility, I took the actual reported departures from Victoria. There is an allowance for unrecorded departures of 10 per cent. on actual recorded departures by land and 9 per cent. on actual recorded departures by sea, from Victoria. These were added on to the actual recorded departures, and they still further reduce the net population.

Mr. CHANTER.—What system is adopted for recording the arrivals and departures?

Mr. McCAY.—Surely the honorable member is aware of the system adopted by the Department of Trade and Customs and the Railway Department.

Mr. CHANTER.—I have seen thousands travelling by rail who were not counted.

Mr. McCAY.—Possibly. I am pointing out that the Statisticians of Victoria and New South Wales between them were only 22,000 out in ten years, and if that 22,000 had been given to Victoria, it would have not have made any difference to her position. It is not a question of a difference of a few thousands, but of a difference of 35,000, or of 24,000 each way, a total of 48,000. If the total of the actually recorded departures from Victoria by land and sea were taken as correct, and no deduction made, that is to say, if we assumed that not a single departure from Victoria has been unrecorded, and the State was credited with 9 per cent. for unrecorded arrivals by sea, and 10 per cent. for unrecorded arrivals by land, and not charged for a single unrecorded departure by either land or sea, she would not have a sufficiently large population to entitle her to a representation of twenty-three members. No Minister, and no member, whatever may be the State he represents, can close his eyes to facts of that kind. I would have acted differently if I could have fairly done so, but it was impossible. As the late Government have suffered a good deal of adverse criticism in this connexion, I trust that, in fairness to us, the facts which I have given to the House will be made public, so that our side of the question, as well as the other side, may be known. So far as this matter is concerned, the present Bill does not in any way alter the facts. On the 31st December last, Queensland was entitled to nine representatives, with a surplus population of 5,010, which was a long way short of the number required to give her a tenth representative.

Mr. FISHER.—But, Victoria and New South Wales count their aliens, while we exclude them from our statistics.

Mr. McCAY.—If Queensland were credited with her 22,000 excluded aliens, and the aliens in the other States were not taken into account, she would still not have a sufficient population to entitle her to a tenth member.

Mr. FISHER.—I admit that.

Mr. McCAY.—On the 31st December, 1904, if the 22,671 aliens in Queensland, which are not now taken into account, had been included in her population, she would have been entitled to only nine representatives, and would have had a surplus of 21,846 people, or 2,754 people short of the number entitling her to a tenth representative. South Australia on the same date had a population entitling her to six representatives, and a surplus of 40,665 people, or 13,222 more than were required for a seventh representative. Both Western Australia and Tasmania send five representatives to this House under the provisions of the Constitution, though their populations do not entitle them to that representation; but when Western Australia has obtained another 10,000 people, if her population continues to increase at the present rate, she will be entitled to her present representation on her statistics as well as under the Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is very little justification for any alteration in the case of Western Australia.

Mr. McCAY.—It is not proposed to make any. On the 31st December, 1904, Victoria was nearer to twenty-three members than to twenty-one, having a population sufficient to entitle her to twenty-two members, and a little more. I also remembered what the tendency of population was, and found that the population of the other States is increasing more rapidly than is that of Victoria. If anything would justify that forecast, the figures for the 31st March and the 30th June of this year do so. They do not cover a long period of time, but the trend is very marked in the six months. On the 31st March of this year the effective population of the Commonwealth was 3,967,388, and the quota 55,102, entitling New South Wales to twenty-six representatives, with a surplus of 32,981 people, or a balance in excess of the requirement for a twenty-seventh representative of 5,430, which was twice as many as the State had three months before. The Victorian population on that date was 1,210,530, which, divided by the quota entitled that State to twenty-one representatives, with a surplus of 53,388 persons, or an excess over the half quota of 25,837, giving her a total representation of twenty-two representatives. She was 29,465 persons short of the population that would have entitling her to a representation of twenty-three members, and only 25,837 in excess of the representation entitling her to twenty-one members.

Mr. TUDOR.—If we wait until next year the figures may be different.

Mr. McCAY.—I am coming to that. On the 30th June of this year the effective population of the Commonwealth—and all the figures with which I have been supplied were supplied to me by the Department of Home Affairs, and obtained by that Department from the Government Statistician of Victoria—was 3,982,188. The population of Victoria was 1,211,003, which, divided by the quota of 55,308, entitled Victoria to a representation of twenty-one members, with a surplus of 49,535, or 21,881 over the half quota, so that the State had then 21,881 more than were necessary to give her a representation of twenty-one members, but was short by 33,327 of the population necessary to entitle her to a representation of twenty-three members. Victoria could not have had a representation of twenty-three members on the 30th June of this year unless she had possessed 33,327 more people than she is estimated to have, and the other States between them had had that number less than they are estimated to have. In other words, the estimates must have been wrong to the extent of 66,654, and it is inconceivable that they could be wrong to that extent. If the figures for the other States were right, and on the 30th June of this year the population of Victoria alone had been underestimated, she would have required, owing to the increase of the quota by the increase of her own population, 48,614 persons more than she was estimated to have, to entitle her to a representation of twenty-three members. What can one do in the face of figures like that? How can one say that any estimate, however open to challenge on the ground of inaccuracy, could be wrong to that extent, in view of the fact that in no previous decennial period, as gauged by the census, have the figures been wrong to that extent? As regards Queensland, the position was the same on the 30th June last as it was on the 31st December. Giving her the excluded aliens, she was 2,049 short of the number which would have entitled her to a tenth representative. On the 30th December Victoria, however, was 24,600 short of the number that would have entitled her to a representation of twenty-three members, while on the 31st March of this year she was 29,400 short, and on the 30th June 33,300 short, assuming that the other States were over-estimated to the same extent. But assuming that the other States were rightly estimated, and that only Victoria was under-estimated, she was 35,836 short on the 31st December of last year, 42,606 short on the 31st March last, and 48,614 short on the 30th June last. I quote these figures to show that if any well-founded charge in connexion with this matter is to be brought against the late Administration, the only one that could be justified would be that, in the interests of Victoria, they did not hurry matters sufficiently to enable things to be fixed up before her population became too small to entitle the State to a representation of twenty-two members. Unless a change takes place within twelve months, from this date, Victoria will be entitled to a representation of only twenty-one members, because her population is increasing at a smaller rate than are the populations of the other States. It is not that it is diminishing.

Mr. TUDOR.—In the country districts the population of Victoria has been diminishing for the last thirty years, although it has been increasing in the towns.

Mr. McCAY.—Her population, as a whole, is increasing slowly, but at a lesser rate than are the populations of the other States. The criticisms passed on the preceding Administration must be admitted, in the face of the facts I have mentioned, to have been unfounded. Apart from the legal question raised, we had no option but to do what was done. We had pledged ourselves to be ready with a scheme of redistribution when we met Parliament again, and, as we believed that the legal position was what we had stated it to be, we had no option to do other than what we did. Neither has this Government the option to do other than what it is doing, if it wishes to act fairly. They provide, first of all, as regards the future for five-yearly periods, and for the present that, as soon as possible after the passing of the measure, an enumeration day shall be fixed, which is saying, in other words, that the figures which were taken by the last Government will be taken by them. I should have preferred decennial to quinquennial periods for the future, for reasons which are obvious.

Mr. FISHER.—Decennial periods are too long.

Mr. McCAY.—I am aware that the representatives of other States would quarrel with a proposal to fix decennial periods. There are cases in which the estimates are pretty near the border line. For instance, we are comparatively near the border line in regard to the figures entitling New South Wales to a twenty-seventh member. On the 31st December last, she had a margin of only 2,767. On the 31st March, it had increased to 5,430, and on the 30th June to 8,311, so that it is rapidly growing. New South Wales is increasing in actual numbers more rapidly than any of the other States. In six months her population has increased by 16,000 persons, while that of Western Australia has increased by 9,000 persons.

Mr. FISHER.—But her percentage increase is not so large as that of Western Australia.

Mr. McCAY.—No. However, the margin over what entitles her to a twenty-seventh member is rapidly growing. With regard to Victoria, if it were a margin of only 2,000, 3,000, or 4,000 we might have said, "We will not deprive a State of a member on such a small difference"; but since it was 35,000, if the other States estimates are correct, and 24,000, if the population of the other States is over-estimated to the same extent, it is very serious. The Bill proposes quinquennial estimates of population, and a decennial census. As I have said, I would prefer decennial periods, but the late Government would have proposed something for regulating the enumeration in a manner similar to that now proposed, if they could have thought it constitutionally correct. That, however, is quite a different matter. The preparations for the future made by this Bill are quite another matter from its recognition of the present position. If the Bill is to become law, the sooner it does so, and is acted upon, the better it will be for Victoria. I must apologize for having detained the House so long, but, as a Victorian Minister in the late Administration, I felt entitled to put before honorable members the facts which influenced us, and compelled us to do what we did. I do not care how much the accuracy of the estimates may be disputed, they cannot be wrong to an extent which will disprove the facts which I have stated. If Victoria was not debited with a single unrecorded departure since the last census—and some 399,000 departures have been recorded since the last census—but, on the other hand, was credited with unrecorded arrivals to the extent of 10 per cent. on the arrivals actually recorded, still, she could not establish her claim to twenty-three members. Struggle gallantly as we might—and we pestered the Minister of Home Affairs to verify his figures, and we challenged the calculations in every possible way—we found that the figures were against us, and we had to give way, and I think that we were justified in doing so. Honorable members will find full particulars of the figures to which I have referred in the following tables:—

On 31st December, 1904, Victoria for 23 Members required 24,631 more people, but then only if the other States actually had 24,631 less.

On 31st March, 1905, Victoria for 23 Members required 29,465 more people, but then only if the other States actually had 29,465 less.

On 30th June, 1905, Victoria for 23 Members required 33,327 more people, but then only if the other States actually had 33,327 less.

ON the assumption that Victoria alone was underestimated as to population, and that the estimates for other States are correct, in order to entitle Victoria to 23 Members, by virtue of having 22 quotas and a half quota.

	Victoria required additional Population.	Commonwealth population would be—	Victorian Population would be—	Quota would be—	Half Quota would be—	Number of Members would be—
On 31st December, 1904 ..	35,836	3,987,665	1,246,140	55,384	27,692	22.5 = 23
On 31st March, 1905 ..	42,606	4,009,994	1,253,136	55,694	27,847	22.5 = 23
On 30th June, 1905 ..	48,614	4,030,802	1,259,617	55,983	27,991	22.5 = 23

I hope that a change will take place, and that the population of Victoria will increase as rapidly as the average population of the Commonwealth, so that that State may not continue to lose representation. But, if the present trend of affairs be any guide, I am afraid that she will have for years to come to face the possibility of a loss of representation. I believe the people of Victoria, when they come to know the facts, will, as fair-minded folk, recognise—as I believe that their representatives in this House will also recognise—that there is no option but to submit to a reduction in the representation of the State. Certain legal objections have been raised against the Bill by distinguished lawyers, but the Government is concerned with the facts upon which justice is established, and this Government, like any other, has to recognise that the facts are such that they cannot stand against them. Even though the Prime Minister is a Victorian, they have to leave the Constitution to its reasonable operation. I think that, apart from all legal objections, the Bill should become law, and that it should be promptly brought into operation. If promptly acted upon it will have the same effect as if the legal question had not been raised; but if it is not promptly brought into operation, the effect upon Victoria will be worse than ever.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—The only difference between myself and the honorable and learned member for Corinella is that he supports the Bill and abuses the Minister; whereas I support the Minister and abuse the Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not remember abusing the Minister.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable and learned member commenced by attacking the Minister in respect to his previous utterances, and he also taunted him with having followed the lead of the previous Government. At all events, I think the Bill is a mistake, and as my name has been mentioned by the honorable and learned member, I wish to explain why I regard the measure as opposed to the provisions of the Constitution. I think that the question of the reduction of the number of representatives of Victoria is a very small one. Australia will not lose anything, so long as good representatives are returned from all parts of Australia in reasonable proportion to the population. The position I take up is a simple one, namely, that it was never intended that the proportion of members for each State should be altered upon the estimate of any statistic, however eminent. That is the whole position, and the honorable and learned member for Corinella did not, in the course of his able speech, discuss the question as to the meaning of the term used in the Constitution, "The latest statistics of the Commonwealth." If the honorable and learned member's view is right, any Ministry, as soon as it thinks there has been a movement of population, will be justified in bringing down a new Representation Bill. That might happen once a year or once in two or three years, and we should be liable at any time to have a Representation Bill brought forward to the exclusion of practical business. This measure provides that the Chief Electoral Officer's certificate shall, for the purposes of the Bill, be accepted as evidence as to the number of the people of the Commonwealth. That certificate must be based upon the statements of the Statisticians, and, therefore, in essence we have to rely upon the Statisticians' statements, and to assume that the numbers of the people in the various States are as the Statisticians estimate them. Personally, I have not the least doubt that Victoria has lost a sufficient number of people in proportion to the other States to reduce her representation in this House. I have not the least doubt as to the trend of population in Victoria as compared with the other States. The honorable and learned member for Corinella stated that he had taken into account the trend of population. That is the very thing he had no right to do. His only consideration should have been the actual population, having regard, not to the Statisticians' statements, but to the latest statistics. Therefore, the honorable and learned member has gone quite beyond his duty in looking at the trend of population. He had no right to do that. If the late Government did that they were wrong, as also is the present Government if it has been influenced by the same consideration. The more we rely upon the actual simple words of the Constitution, the better we shall be able to judge as to the attitude we should assume now and hereafter, because the Bill will be used hereafter as a precedent for making other changes in the representation, when other States will be prejudicially affected. I warned the Minister for Home Affairs that he was wrong with regard to a section of the Judiciary Act, but he did not take heed of my advice, and afterwards in the Courts it was found that I was right. I say without hesitation that in this case he is going wrong with regard to the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, because Statisticians' guesses are not the latest statistics.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—Does the honorable and learned member suggest that the latest census is referred to?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I do not confine myself to the latest census, but to the latest systematic enumeration.

Mr. GLYNN.—By the Commonwealth?

Mr. HIGGINS.—That may be a debatable matter, but, at all events there must be a systematic enumeration.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—A progressive statistical return?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I do not think that that is necessarily a systematic enumeration.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable and learned member mean an actual count of heads?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I mean an actual count of heads in some fashion which may reasonably be called an enumeration, and not a mere estimate. If one looks at section 24 of the Constitution, he will see that it is clear that the number of members chosen in the several States is to be in proportion to the respective numbers of the people. That is all very well, supposing that the number of the people can be ascertained. But the section afterwards describes how the number of members is to be ascertained. It proceeds—

And shall, until Parliament otherwise provides, be determined whenever necessary in the following manner—

I see no difficulty in regard to the meaning of the words "whenever necessary." They mean simply whenever it is necessary to determine the number—that the number shall be determined whenever it is necessary. Now let us see how that number is to be determined. The section provides—

A quota shall be ascertained by dividing the number of the people of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by twice the number of the senators.

At the time the Constitution was framed all the States had a census taken at least once in ten years, and we dealt with the state of affairs as it then existed. The idea was obviously that we should rely upon the census, and that we should not be affected by the trend of population, as the honorable and learned member for Corinella would have it, or by the calculations or estimates of statisticians. It was intended that the number of the people should be ascertained by the latest statistics; as matters stood then, by the last census.

Mr. CONROY.—Does the honorable and learned member mean to say that the draftsman did not understand the difference between "census" and "statistics"?

Mr. HIGGINS.—No. But I say that the draftsman had in his mind a systematic enumeration, and that if he had intended the numbers to be ascertained by any other means than an enumeration he would have specified it. The draftsman did not know exactly what method of enumeration might be followed in the various States, and therefore he used the term "latest statistics." No doubt he had mainly in his mind the last census. If it were at all material the honorable and learned member for Corinella has shown that the population of Victoria has not been advancing in the same ratio as those of the other States. With all respect to the honorable and learned member, I do not think that that has anything to do with the question. It might on certain occasions justify a certain enumeration, or the taking of a census more frequently than every ten years; but at the same time it has nothing to do with the question of our being guided by the latest statistics. If honorable members will look at the meaning of the word "statistics" in any dictionary, they will find that it means a systematic enumeration, and not a series of ingenious guesses. I do not object to the reduction of the number of Victorian representatives, because I think that that is a matter of very little importance. As Victorians, I think we are all well protected by our having representatives from the other States here, who will take care that no injustice is done to us. It is not on that ground that I take objection to the Bill. When I was asked whether the proposed mode of changing the representation was constitutional, I stated that we were bound to abide by the statistics as they appeared in the last actual count. Take the case of China, for instance. There have been grave questions as to the actual population of that country. Suppose any one spoke of the latest population statistics with regard to China, we should say there were no such statistics. While persons have estimated the population of China with very great care, their estimates do not constitute statistics. Therefore, I think that the honorable and learned member for Corinella has absolutely missed the point at issue. Having regard to the fact that the best statisticians make serious errors, those who framed our Constitution decided that "the latest statistics of the Commonwealth" should form the basis of the representation of the States, and not the estimates of States Statisticians. An attempt has been made to show that the words "the latest statistics of the Commonwealth" mean the latest statistical estimates of the Commonwealth. I attach very little importance to the reduction in the number of Victorian representatives in this House. But I say that hereafter other changes will be recommended upon the faith of this procedure. I hold that we are going the wrong way to work. We are asked to break the constitutional prescription by bringing in a number of matters which we have no right to introduce, such as the supposed trend of population, which might alter to-morrow, as the result of a gold rush, for which contingency provision is made in the Constitution.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—The able and exhaustive address of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, in which he gave figures which I had intended to use in the debate upon this Bill, renders it unnecessary for me to enter into many considerations that otherwise I would have felt myself justified in debating. As the Minister who was primarily responsible for the proposal which was accepted by the late Cabinet, I endeavoured to approach the matter of the representation of the States with an independent mind, and with an unbiased judgment, such as I am sure any member of this House placed in a similar position would have sought to exhibit. When it was decided that a redistribution of seats should take place, I was asked by the officers of the Department whether the representation of the States was to be taken into account. I replied that, as the Constitution declared that "whenever necessary" the representation of the individual States should be taken into account, surely it was necessary—if it would ever be necessary—when we were adjusting the inequalities between electorate and electorate that we should adjust those between State and State. In regard to the steps which were to be taken to make that adjustment, I instructed the electoral officers that unless they saw reason to depart from the procedure adopted by another Ministry, when the same problem was under consideration, that procedure was to be followed in its entirety. That was done. I saw no reason to depart from it, and the action taken by a previous Ministry was consequently followed by the late Government. To me it is rather strange that some of those who have taken exception to the action of the late Government were members of this Parliament at the time the Barton Administration accepted the statistics furnished by the States Statisticians, gazetted them as the statistics of the Commonwealth, and determined—as they showed no necessity for altering the representation of the States—that there should be no alteration in that representation. That process was adopted by the Barton Government. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and the present Attorney-General were members of this House at the time. Upon that occasion allusion was made to the method which was being adopted, but neither they, nor any other member of the House, offered one word of objection to the procedure of that Government.

Mr. FISHER.—Political issues were not affected.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member for Wide Bay has made an interjection which partakes of the nature of a suggestion. I do not say for a moment that honorable members remained quiet, although a wrong course was being followed, simply because their State representation was not affected. I would rather put it the other way, and say that, as their State representation was not affected, their attention was not sufficiently directed to the procedure which was being adopted, and consequently they accepted it without that greater deliberation which they gave to the matter when they saw that their State's representation was to be decreased.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I should not have observed it but for the fact that I was asked a question.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If the Barton Government took a wrong course upon that occasion, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, as well as every other member of this House, was equally responsible.

Mr. GROOM.—At that time attention was drawn to the want of uniformity in the method of taking the returns.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Some attention was drawn to the omission of a large number of aliens in the case of Queensland.

Mr. GROOM.—And to the uncertainty as to whether a uniform rule was being applied.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne states that when the Federal Convention decided upon section 24 of the Constitution, the delegates had in mind the census returns as the basis of State representation. Is it not surprising—as was put by the honorable and learned member for Corinella—that the Bill which formed the basis of our Constitution—that is, the draft Bill of 1891—actually declared that the consideration of the necessity for an alteration in the representation of the States should take place after a census.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The word “statistics” is larger than the word “census.”

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If the word “statistics” has a larger meaning than the word “census,” it was adopted in order that something more than census might be adopted for the official returns. The clause in the draft Bill framed by the Convention of 1891, which bears upon this matter, states—

A fresh apportionment of the representation of the States shall be made after each census of the people of the Commonwealth, which shall be taken at intervals not longer than ten years, but a fresh apportionment shall not take effect until the next general election.

That provision was deliberately abandoned by the Conventions which met prior to the establishment of Federation. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne had every reason to know that it had been abandoned, because it was abandoned not only in regard to the Constitution Act, but also in regard to the first representation of the States in this House. Surely, if there was ever an occasion upon which the census returns should have been taken to determine the exact representation of the States, that occasion was when the number of representatives to which the various States were originally entitled in this Parliament was fixed. Surely that was the most important epoch in the history of this question. At that time the 1901 census could easily have been ante-dated. The Commonwealth could have taken the census a year earlier. Instead of that, the Convention deliberately adopted the figures of the Statisticians.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Did not the subsequent census prove that those figures were considerably out in the totals?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—They did not affect the representation. The subsequent figures did prove that there were some 10,000 or 12,000 persons in one State less than was estimated, and about as many more in another. But to meet the error which the Statisticians saw had crept in during that period, they adopted certain allowances, which have been embodied in the Bill under consideration.

Mr. HIGGINS.—How does that affect the question of the meaning of the words “the latest statistics”?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I intend to show that, so far from determining that the statistics should be those of a census, the Convention decided that the original representation of the States should be based upon the figures of the Statisticians.

Mr. GLYNN.—The States had nothing to go on.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Commonwealth could have readily anticipated the 1901 census by taking a census in 1900.

Mr. GLYNN.—The States do not all take their census at the same time.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But the Commonwealth could have arranged that the census should anticipate the fixing of the representation. Here is what Mr. O'Connor moved in connexion with the fixing of the original representation of the States:—

Notwithstanding anything in section 24, the number of members to be chosen by each State at the first election shall be as follows:—To be determined according to the latest statistical returns at the date of the passing of the Act, and in relation to the quota referred to in previous sections.

The following is an extract from the report:—

Mr. O'CONNOR (New South Wales).—I beg to move—That the words “section 24” (line 2) be struck out, and that the words “the last preceding section” be substituted.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria).—I see in this clause that there is a gap after the words “as follows.” At what stage is it proposed to have that gap filled up? Is it before this Bill is sent Home, or afterwards?

Mr. O'CONNOR.—It is to be filled up according to the latest statistical returns, at the date of the passing of the Act, by the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS.—You leave it for the Imperial Parliament to fill in the gap?

Mr. O'CONNOR.—Undoubtedly. The figures may change in the meantime.

The amendment was agreed to.

This absolutely shows what was the intention of the Convention—subsequently indorsed by the Imperial Act—as to the first representation in the Commonwealth Parliament. We see that the Convention deliberately substituted for the word “census” the words “the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.”

Mr. GLYNN.—They omitted all reference to “statistics” from clause 26.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But they deliberately left out of clause 24 the reference to the census contained in the draft Bill.

Mr. GLYNN.—The more significant point is that they never inserted those words in clause 26.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is provided that the latest statistics of the Commonwealth are to be taken for the purpose of establishing the representation.

Mr. HIGGINS.—No; the “statistical returns.”

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—What is the difference?

Mr. HIGGINS.—There is a material difference.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — The action of the present Ministry shows that the late Government could not have taken any other course than they did. We find that when they are face to face with the situation that we had confronting us they are prepared to take the same statistics. Even census returns are far from being absolutely correct.

Mr. HIGGINS.—They are the best that we can obtain, and why should we not go for the best?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I repeat that the census returns are not absolutely correct; that the States having larger areas and more scattered populations invariably suffer. This is proven by the electoral returns. I have before me some figures, which I prepared for another purpose, that illustrate the point I am now making. They show what is the actual proportion of the elective population of each State to the whole population, and I may say, in passing, that I compared them, after the electoral lists had been collected, with the proportion of the electors in each State. I shall merely quote the figures relating to four of the States, as showing that it is quite impossible to accept the census returns as fully in the case of the larger States, where the population is scattered, as in the case of the smaller States. In New South Wales, for instance, the proportion of those over twenty-one years of age to the total population was 52 per cent., while the proportion of electors was only 46 per cent., or a difference of 6 per cent. In Victoria, with its circumscribed area and closer settlement, the proportion of those over twenty-one years of age to the total population was 54 per cent., and the proportion of electors to the total population was 51 per cent., or a difference of only 3 per cent. In Queensland, on the other hand, the proportion of those over twenty-one years of age to the total population was 52 per cent., whereas the proportion of electors to the whole population was 44 per cent., a difference of 8 per cent. In Tasmania, again, the proportion of those over twenty-one years of age to the total population was 50 per cent., and the proportion of electors to the total population was 47 per cent., or a difference of 3 per cent.—exactly the same as in the case of Victoria. These figures illustrate the effect of concentration; and also prove that a census—which is called for in connexion with this matter, because it is supposed to be almost absolutely correct—may be very far out in the case of the larger States. I admit, after all, that the census must be the basis of our calculation; but I hold that, having regard to the movements of our population—to the fact that large numbers are attracted from one State to another by developments such as have occurred in Western Australia—it would be highly undesirable to deal with the question of representation only once in ten years. I agree that the provision in the Bill, providing for a re-arrangement every five years, is sufficient. As regards the loss of a representative by Victoria, which, as the honorable and learned member for Corinella has said, has nothing whatever to do with the gain of a member by New South Wales, I personally regret, as much as does any representative of this State, the fact that Victoria, for some considerable time, has failed to keep step with the other States in the matter of population. No State can suffer in this respect without some reflective action on another, and, if it were possible, it would be well, not only for Victoria, but for the whole of the Commonwealth, that there should be progress along the whole line. We have to recognise, however, that the population, not only of Victoria, but of Australia, is shifting from the pressure of the closely-settled parts to the more open areas of the Continent, and that it is probable that the increase in the States possessing the larger areas will be for many years out of proportion to the increase of population in Victoria.

Mr. TUDOR.—But it is our country districts that are losing population.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am sorry to hear that. A loss in the rural districts is one of the worst features associated with a reduction of population. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has said that the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and his colleagues in the late Ministry, had no right to take into consideration the trend of population. I assert, however, that we had a right to take into account every circumstance that would tend to show the correctness, or incorrectness, of the figures with which we were dealing. Our sole object was to ascertain whether those figures really represented the actual facts. and, in justice to the State of Victoria, every point was taken into account, in order that it might be ascertained whether or not any serious error had been committed. That was only what ought to have been done. It was recognised that the whole trend of population since 1891 supported the figures presented to us by the Statisticians. Had the Federation been in existence in 1891, Victoria would have been entitled, on the census returns of that year, to twenty-six representatives. and New South Wales would have also been entitled to twenty-six. But every enumeration that has been taken since then shows the trend of population to be in the direction of a reduction in the case of Victoria, and an increase particularly in the case of New South Wales and some of the other States, although that increase has not been quite sufficient in the latter to call for an addition to their representation.

Mr. GROOM.—The trend of population has been towards the north.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—And also towards the west. So far as Western Australia is concerned, however, any increase that has occurred is covered by the special representation which it is allowed under the Constitution. I am not going to repeat the figures quoted by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, but I would remind the House that even the returns for the last two quarters show that the trend of population is further and further in the same direction. In these circumstances, I think that the representatives of Victoria in the late Ministry were thoroughly justified in the decision at which they arrived, in common with their colleagues who represented other States. As honest representatives of the Commonwealth as a whole, they were fully justified in arriving at the decision that the only course open to them was that which they adopted. It was for this reason that, although I was the Minister primarily responsible for the proposal, I was very pleased to allow the honorable and learned member for Corinella, as one of the representatives of Victoria in the late Ministry, who was attacked by the press of his own State for his action in this regard, to precede me in order that he might have the first opportunity to put forward the figures on which we relied, and to explain the reasons for the decision arrived at by the late Cabinet. The present Attorney-General, when the proposals of the late Government were made public, seemed to consider that that Government were acting unfairly to Victoria, and that they had no right to accept the Statisticians' figures as determining the basis of representation. He appeared to hold the view that the census should alone be adopted as the basis of representation; but as soon as he and his colleagues are faced with the responsibility which every member has to bear when acting, not for a section, but for the whole of the Commonwealth, we find them accepting as the basis of the representation of the States in the near future, the very statistics which their predecessors were blamed for adopting.

Mr. FISHER.—But a great deal has happened since then.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—There are of course explanations. I hope that in this connexion, the Minister of Home Affairs will see that the very considerable expense incurred by the late Government in this direction will not be lost—that action will be taken at a sufficiently early date to make use of the figures, and, as far as possible, of the divisions that were adopted by the Commissioners appointed by the late Government. Otherwise there would be, not only a great deal of confusion, but large additional expense. I think that, now that it has been determined that the figures of the Statisticians are to be taken, the sooner we progress with the previous scheme of redistribution the better it will be for the Parliament and for the finances of the Federation.

Mr. PAGE.—Is there any difference between the scheme provided for in the Bill and that which the honorable member's Government introduced?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — I have said that there is none. We were reviled for our evil acts, and attacked for our unconstitutional proceedings; but our successors are now faced with the same facts. I do not say that it is to their discredit that they are doing what we did. I would have thought it to their discredit if, in order to enable some of their members to act consistently with their previous remarks, they had adopted something which was not fair and just. Having been faced by the facts and circumstances with which we were faced, the present Ministry have had to come to the same conclusion.

Mr. FISHER.—Does not the honorable member think it an advantage to have statutory provision for quinquennial enumerations.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member will understand that the late Government had to take action during the recess. We had promised Parliament that action would be taken for a redistribution during the recess, so that everything would be ready when Parliament met. We could not redistribute the electorates until we had determined what the representation of the States should be. That was the first question which faced me as the Minister who inquired into this matter. A decision as to what the representation of the States should be had to precede redistribution. Unless I could get the machinery to work in time to have matters ready for Parliament when it met, I should have broken my promise to the House, which I had no intention of doing, or should have had to postpone the putting forward of my proposals to so late a period of the session that they would probably not have been carried into effect. Therefore, the Government decided to act in this matter just as the Barton Ministry had acted. But that did not prevent us from further dealing with it so that future distributions should not be left to the mere whim or will of the Ministry, and I had a proposal to bring that about. But that was to be at a later stage. We had to come to Parliament before that could be accomplished.

Mr. PAGE.—Did the honorable member really intend to do what this Government proposes to do?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not say that we intended to do exactly what is now proposed, but I had a proposal for the consideration of the Cabinet.

Mr. GROOM.—Had the honorable member drafted a Bill?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—No. I had drafted some clauses for the Electoral Amendment Bill, but it was considered wiser that they should be inserted in a separate measure.

Mr. PAGE.—But the honorable member's proposal would have had the same effect as that of this Ministry?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It would have provided for fixed periods of readjustment of representation, instead of leaving matters to the will or whim of the Ministry.

Mr. FISHER.—Hear hear. The principle is the same.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am not, of course, speaking of this as the proposal of the Cabinet, because it had not received the consideration of the Cabinet. I myself would go even further, and would say that we should by law determine when there should be redistributions.

Mr. FISHER.—Hear, hear. I would say every five years.

Mr. GLYNN.—We could do that only indirectly by saying when there should be enumerations.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — Or by determining how many electorates must be out of balance to make a redistribution necessary.

Mr. GROOM.—A suggestion as to that is contained in the Electoral Bill.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I put a suggestion of that kind into the Electoral Bill which I prepared. It is highly improper that these matters should be left to Ministers. Sometimes it leads to perhaps unfounded charges against Ministers, on the score that they are acting in their own interest or in that of their party. Moreover, this is not a question for a Ministry alone. Every State and every representative of a State has a right in this respect.

I think that the members who represent the States should determine, not merely when a readjustment of representation shall take place, but when redistributions shall take place. That may easily be provided for, either at certain periods, or when a certain proportion of the electorates are beyond the margin allowed.

Mr. GROOM.—That proposal is contained in the Electoral Bill which has been circulated to-day.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—No doubt the Minister would have made such provision of his own accord, but he has flattered me by adopting the proposal which I put into my Electoral Bill. I shall not detain the House longer. The honorable and learned member for Corinella has put the facts and figures which I, as well as he, had collected, exceedingly fairly and very ably before the House. He has, I think, shown the people of Victoria that the Victorian members of the late Ministry, so far from neglecting the interests of that State, fought every inch along the line, until they found that justice and honesty were against any other position than that which they agreed to adopt.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Is that revealing a Cabinet secret?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is not. The honorable and learned member for Corinella has said that they were my severest critics, and so they were. But they were always fair critics, and when they were convinced that any other attitude would not be an honorable one to maintain, they, like honorable men, in spite of their regret that Victoria would lose by a readjustment of representation, came to the same determination as that of the other members of the Cabinet.

Mr. FISHER.—What about the Argus? The honorable member will surely not dispute the fairness of that newspaper? It says that it should not be done.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not admit that any newspaper is fair at all times, and it is a failing with all of us that we regard a newspaper as unfair whenever it differs from and criticises us. It is in the interests of the whole Commonwealth that there should be an honest and straightforward settlement of this matter. What I am sure will be the decision of Parliament will do credit to us, and will help to establish confidence, which would have been shattered had either the Ministry or the members of this Parliament taken the advice of certain newspapers, whose one law seems to be that the rule of might is the rule of right.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley). — You, Mr. Speaker, must recognise the courage and critical faculty of the honorable and learned member for Corinella in reference to this matter. So powerful was his criticism of the measure that, contrary to my ordinary behaviour, I was compelled to make an unwilling exclamation. I agree with him in lamenting the depopulation of Victoria.

Mr. McCAY. — Not depopulation, but less rapid increase of population.

Mr. WILKS.—I will qualify my statement in that way. I do not rejoice or gloat over this fact, and I sympathize with the honorable and learned member in being compelled to point out the great disparity which now exists between the various electorates. Bad as we have always considered the position to be, the honorable and learned member's close examination of the facts has shown it to be even worse than we expected. But honorable members as a whole will, I am certain, take an Australian view of this matter. They will not be influenced by the fact that New South Wales will gain a representative by a readjustment of the representation of the Commonwealth. In a few years Queensland may be in a similar position, because the tendency of our population is to increase more rapidly in the eastern and north-eastern coastal districts than elsewhere. The present Government are doing what the late Government were reviled for proposing to do. If Victoria were in the position which New South Wales occupies, the press and public of this State would be clamouring for a readjustment of representation. But although the Reid Government were reviled for what they proposed, the only difference between their proposal and that of this Government is that they wished to do by an Order in Council what this Government wishes to do by an Act of Parliament. However, the fact that a machinery Bill has been brought in does not satisfy me of the bona fides of the Ministry. It is no test of the genuineness of their desire to have a readjustment of representation. Possibly the introduction of this measure may delay that readjustment. All that the Bill does is to empower the Chief Electoral Officer to obtain certain figures from the Statisticians, but the Minister of Home Affairs could have obtained the same information without the passing of the measure. The Barton Ministry evaded the position altogether, the Reid Ministry were prevented from recognising it, and what reason have we to believe that the Deakin Ministry will not also evade it?

Mr. FISHER.—Surely we must take their word?

Mr. WILKS.—That is like asking a child to shut its eyes, open its mouth, and take what is given to it. The honorable member for Wide Bay is not a child, and he is not so unsophisticated as to suppose that the measure now before us will in itself suffice to bring about a redistribution of seats. I would ask the Minister of Home Affairs whether it is the intention of the Government as soon as this measure is passed to take the steps necessary to bring about a redistribution of seats before the present session closes?

Mr. GROOM.—As soon as the Bill is passed, its provisions will be acted upon, and as soon as a redistribution is shown to be necessary, provision will be made for it.

Mr. WILKS.—There is no authority for making such a redistribution under this Bill.

Mr. GROOM.—Provision is made under the Electoral Bill which is being circulated in the Senate. That measure provides that a redistribution shall be made whenever it is shown to be necessary.

Mr. WILKS.—The present measure does not make a redistribution necessary, although the honorable and learned member for Corinella quoted certain figures which showed that it should take place at the earliest possible moment. Several members of the present Ministry were opposed to a redistribution of seats on a former occasion. Some of them said that the States statistics could not be relied upon, and yet they have under the present Bill accepted the same means of information that were then available. The Barton Government baulked at one hurdle, and how are we to know that the present Government will not baulk at some other obstacle? How are we to know that a redistribution of seats will take place unless some guarantee is afforded that the certificate of the Chief Electoral Officer will be acted upon? Judging from previous experience, we have every reason to entertain doubts as to the practical results likely to follow from this measure. It was very gratifying to find the honorable and learned member for Corinella giving his strong support to the measure, and acknowledging that it was necessary in order to do full justice to the other States. I think, however, that we shall not satisfactorily deal with this matter until some authority outside of Parliament is empowered to carry out the intentions of the Constitution. We know that certain delays may take place, because certain regulations are required to be laid before Parliament, and I can foresee that ample means would be available to those who desired to prevent a redistribution of seats from being brought about. The figures presented to us by the honorable and learned member for Corinella with regard to the disparity in the number of electors were really astonishing. If such figures had been submitted by representatives of New South Wales they would have been discredited; but now there can be no doubt as to their correctness, and I hope that the Government, in view of the necessities of the case, will do everything they can to facilitate a redistribution of seats. We all regret that one State is losing population, but that is not a matter of parliamentary concern. Parliament should have no control over the redistribution of the electorates. That is a question solely affecting the interests of the electors, and therefore should be placed entirely beyond parliamentary control. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne raised a mere quibble when he spoke of the necessity for a systematic enumeration. He was not so much concerned about a systematic enumeration as a systematic evasion of the Constitution. The assurance given by the Minister of Home Affairs, that as soon as the Electoral Officer has obtained sufficient information to justify a redistribution of seats, the electorates in the various States will be distributed upon an equitable basis, is satisfactory so far as it goes, but I should like to feel as sure of winning £10,000 as I do that obstacles will be raised to the redistribution of seats, which will result in our going to our constituents next year under the same conditions that obtained at the last election. I am satisfied that the forces in Victoria in opposition to the Bill are strong enough to create almost insuperable obstacles to its being carried into practical effect. I do not suggest that the Ministry have brought forward the Bill as a subterfuge, but I feel confident that it will be so used as a consequence of representations which will be made by the Victorian press and others. I do not consider that the interests of the electors will be safeguarded until the whole question of the redistribution of seats is taken out of the hands of Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I think that a mistake was made by the first Federal Parliament in not making provision for the compilation of Commonwealth statistics. I think it is fairly clear that the intention was that, as soon as possible after the first Parliament was returned, statistics should be prepared for the purpose of ascertaining the number of representatives to which each State was entitled. Although the Constitution declares that members are to be returned in proportion to the number of people in each State, it does not follow that we should be continually changing the representation. The wording of our Constitution is not the same as that adopted in the United States Constitution, but the effect is the same. In the latter case, provision is made that the representation of the various States shall be according to the respective numbers of the people, but no provision is made for an enumeration every year for the purpose of ascertaining whether the proportion of representation of the various States is to be varied. They have had a census every ten years, but, as a matter of fact, they are not obliged to wait for that period to elapse. At the outset provision was made in Article I., section 3, for a certain number of members for each State until an Act could be passed to provide for specifically ascertaining the actual population. That was what was done under our own Constitution. The American Constitution went on to say that the actual enumeration should be made within three years after the first meeting of Congress. In other words, it was distinctly stated in the Constitution that the first Congress must pass an Act to provide, not for the adoption of existing statistics, but for ascertaining by a special enumeration the number of people within the Federation, in order that the number of members to which each State was entitled might be determined. The Constitution goes on to say that an enumeration shall take place within every subsequent period of ten years. We are attempting to accomplish the same result, but by somewhat different words.

Our Constitution does not provide for the statistics of the States being made the basis of their representation in this Parliament. Instead, the framers of our Constitution left it to be understood that the blanks, which appear in section 26, were to be filled up by taking the statistics of the States pro tem., and ascertaining by the application of the quota the number of members to which they were entitled. Practically what the Convention did was to declare that the number of representatives to which each State is entitled shall be ascertained by Commonwealth statistics. I do not believe that we ought to adopt the statistics of the States for that purpose. We are doing that, but it is not what the Constitution contemplates. That charter of government contemplates that we should not sleep upon this matter—that we should have made some provision in this connexion four years ago.

Mr. GROOM.—But there was a census taken four years ago.

Mr. GLYNN.—For Commonwealth purposes, the Constitution ignores State statistics. Those statistics are absolutely good for State purposes until we pass an Act dealing with statistics and abrogate State legislation upon the subject. The powers of the States extend only to the collection of statistics for State purposes. When we pass an Act relating to statistics and census we can alter the method of collecting statistics within the various States, because that method must be uniform throughout the Commonwealth, if we so prescribe it. The States have no concurrent power to declare that their statistics shall affect the representation of the Commonwealth.

Mr. CONROY.—They can declare what those statistics are, and we can adopt them.

Mr. GLYNN.—That is so. But I would point out that our Constitution does not contemplate that we should really adopt the statistics of the States for the purposes of a first redistribution.

Mr. McCAY.—Surely that is what the Constitution says.

Mr. GLYNN.—The honorable and learned member commenced his argument by introducing the opinions of various delegates, as expressed in the Federal Convention. I quite agree that it is a very vicious principle to attempt to interpret the Constitution, or its presumed intention, merely by quoting the words employed by any Convention delegate. I do not quote the opinions expressed by delegates—

I rely upon the spirit of the Constitution. The honorable and learned member for Corinella, however, went further than that. He sought to justify the action of the late Government in following the precedent of the Barton Administration—which declared the existing statistics of the States to be valid without a Commonwealth Act—by showing that a similar mistake was made by delegates to the Convention. What appears to have been contemplated was, that we should follow the American example. Consequently, I say that we should put it out of the power of the States to determine what ought to be the basis of representation in this House. The Commonwealth ought to deal with this matter. If we rely upon States statistics, one State may very easily obtain a far bigger representation than that to which it is entitled. Hence the power from the very outset was deliberately taken from the States. But now, owing to the delay which has taken place, we are obliged to adopt what has been done by the States.

Mr. SKENE.—Why are we obliged to do that?

Mr. GLYNN.—Because it seems fairly clear upon the statistics of the States that Victoria will lose one representative, whilst New South Wales will gain one; and, as the cost of taking a census would be £120,000, the late Ministry declared—and the present Government entertain the same view—that it would be a pity to take a special census for the purpose of giving New South Wales its proper share of representation. At the same time, we are not obliged to do that. We ought in future to adopt a specific enumeration for Commonwealth purposes. We ought not to rely upon the statistics of the States.

Mr. CONROY.—Could not our statistical officer refuse to adopt the statistics of the States if he thought that they were "cooked"?

Mr. GLYNN.—We prescribe the manner in which he is to make the enumeration.

Mr. McCAY.—Under this Bill the statistics of the States may be rejected.

Mr. GLYNN.—No doubt they may be. We have the power to declare that in future a specific enumeration shall be the basis of the parliamentary representation of the States. Under sections 24 and 51 of the Constitution we have that power. The method of ascertaining the population of the States for the purposes of section

24 may be determined by Parliament. Under section 51 statistics may also be collected, but the manner in which we are to obtain statistics for the purposes of representation is a matter for our own option. I would suggest that, as we have power to postpone a redistribution for a period of ten years, we ought to say that at the end of every ten years the census returns collected by the Commonwealth shall form the basis of the representation of the States. We do not desire frequent changes. They are bad in principle, and are practised nowhere. Even democratic countries are not continually redistributing their electorates, although representation in some States is based as far as possible upon their population. The Bill itself is intended to make temporary provision in this respect by adopting the census returns of the States as the basis of representation. Upon a glance at its provisions, I confess that to me they appear to be somewhat inconsistent. For instance, clause 3 provides that an enumeration day shall be appointed at the expiration of every fifth year after the taking of the then last preceding census, whereas clause 4 declares that—

Until the census is taken pursuant to any law of the Commonwealth, the census taken pursuant to the law of any State shall, as regards that State, be the census for the purposes of this Act.

It seems to me that one State may take a census return during one year, and another State during a different year.

Mr. FISHER.—I think that the census taking is now uniform throughout the States.

Mr. GLYNN.—If that be so, my objection falls to the ground.

Mr. FISHER.—Speaking from memory, I think that the census returns are now taken at a uniform time throughout the States.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Nearly all communities compile their census returns during years ending with the figure "one"—as, for example, in 1901.

Mr. GLYNN.—I doubt whether clause 10 is constitutional, but upon that question I shall defer my remarks until the Bill reaches Committee.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—I listened with very great pleasure to the speech delivered by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, but I have consistently held that it is undesirable to accept mere statistics as the basis for determining so important a matter as that which is involved in this Bill. When I was in London, some time ago, I heard Lord Rosebery deliver a speech, in the course of which, in commenting on certain figures which had been presented, he referred to the various degrees of unreliability by saying, "There are lies, condemnable lies, and statistics." Whilst I think that our State statistics are compiled with care, and that they are the result of years of experience, I cannot imagine that our Constitution intended anything else than that there should have been some general compilation of the population of the entire Commonwealth. As far as I can understand, the Constitution does not declare that the Commonwealth must of necessity accept the statistics of the States in any shape or form. We have the power to do so if we choose, but surely as a general principle it is desirable that there should be some means of ascertaining, for Commonwealth purposes, what is the population of the Commonwealth. We can only arrive at an accurate knowledge of what our population is, for the purposes of State representation, by taking a census. Honorable members admit that it is an unimportant matter whether New South Wales gains an additional representative and Victoria loses one. If that be so, why should we change the existing state of things with such haste, and before we have obtained accurate figures as to the population of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Because a Redistribution of Seats Bill has been promised. Under the circumstances referred to by the honorable member, we should be again called upon, within a very short period, to effect another redistribution.

Mr. KNOX.—That would not be a very expensive proceeding. It would merely involve the appointment of a Commissioner—

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It would also mean the printing of new rolls.

Mr. KNOX.—Surely the rolls would have to be revised every year, in order to meet the movements in population.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—They would have to be redistributed.

Mr. KNOX.—I feel that, in view of all these facts, I shall be justified in adhering to the opinion I have formed that we shall act wisely in refraining from making any alteration in the representation of the States until we have the census returns before us. If we are to have changes of representation at intervals of less than ten years, we shall have a state of uncertainty which is highly undesirable. The disadvantages of making a change at the present time would overwhelm any of the suggested advantages to be derived from this measure, and I think that we ought to wait until we have the actual census figures before us. I shall not venture to discuss the question of what is the meaning of the words "the latest statistics of the Commonwealth," as used in the section of the Constitution governing this matter. That is a question that must be left to the lawyers. All that I have to do is to consider the question from a common-sense point of view, and I have arrived at the conclusion that the only satisfactory statistics that we can adopt are those obtained as the result of an elaborate, proper, and systematic enumeration, taken either directly for Commonwealth purposes, or in the ordinary course of events by the individual States. I think I shall be acting in the best interests of the Commonwealth, as well as of the State of which I am a representative, in voting against the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—I desire to refer briefly to this question, which is one of the gravest importance, and may have a serious bearing on the State of which I have the honour to be a representative. I deeply regret that the honorable member for Dalley should have made a comparison which is not fair to any State, and is particularly unfair to Victoria. The honorable member said that he viewed with feelings of astonishment the fact that the honorable and learned member for Corinella, although a representative of Victoria, should have been able to summon sufficient courage to make the exhaustive statement that he did regarding the question of representation as adversely affecting this State. I sincerely hope that one's views on this question will not be held to be entirely coloured and controlled by the fact that one is a representative of a particular State. It is well that we should recognise that we are here as the representatives, not of any particular State, but of the whole Commonwealth. It should be our desire to do justice to every part of the Commonwealth, and not to secure advantages for one State at the expense of the rest. That is the view which I take in approaching this question. The honorable and learned member for Corinella was enabled to make an elaborate statement because of the fact that, as a member of the late Government, he had access to documents and records which are not readily obtainable by private members. He had also had an opportunity to discuss the question with his colleagues in the late Government, and, knowing the loyalty to their State of the three members of that Cabinet who represented Victoria, I am sure that that discussion was a very full one. In these circumstances the honorable and learned member has been able to deal more completely with the whole question than an honorable member in ordinary circumstances could hope to do. It seemed to me that he was more anxious to excuse the act of the late Government—

Mr. McCAY.—I did not wish to excuse anything; there was nothing requiring an excuse.

Mr. SALMON.—I am referring only to the impression which his speech made on my mind, and am not going to ascribe to the honorable and learned member any motive that he would not care to have attributed to him. The feeling that was engendered by the statement that he made to the House was that he was more anxious to explain and to excuse the action of the Government of which he was a member—

Mr. McCAY.—Not excuse, please.

Mr. SALMON.—I am speaking only of the opinion that I formed. I may have misapprehended the honorable and learned member's intention, but that is my misfortune rather than his fault.

Mr. HIGGINS.—He was seeking to justify the action of the late Government.

Mr. SALMON.—At all events, that was the impression which I formed from his speech, and it is one which, notwithstanding his disclaimer, is still firmly fixed in my mind. It is a misfortune that we have to view the matter of the representation of the States in the House and that of the actual electoral representation from two different stand-points. In section 24 of the Constitution the expression "the people of the Commonwealth" is used, apparently with the intention that the representatives shall be chosen by the electors of the whole Commonwealth. In the same section, however, the words "the people" are used in quite a different sense, the intention there being to refer to the whole of the population of the Commonwealth. It is a misfortune that the Constitution is not more explicit with regard to this point. It is also unfortunate that the numbers of those who are to constitute the State representation are to be different from those who are to provide the electoral representation. I am not going to discuss the alleged loss of population, because I do not believe that any loss has actually occurred. The fact remains, however, that for some reason or other Victoria has not progressed so rapidly in the matter of population as have the other States. We have some solace in the fact that the latest electoral rolls show that Victoria has not gone back in the matter of her electoral representation. We have now on the rolls for Victoria 2,260 more electors than there were at the time of the election in 1903; but the rolls for New South Wales show that she has 21,071 less than she had at the election in question. I quote these figures in order to give point to the argument that it is to be regretted that population, and population alone, should be the governing factor in the matter of representation. To my mind, the framers of the Constitution would have shown greater forethought had they provided that the electoral strength of a State should have some bearing on any alteration so far as its representation in this Chamber was concerned. If the Bill now before us be carried, and the estimates which have been quoted by the honorable and learned member for Corinella be adopted, what will be the position? We shall have a representative of New South Wales representing on the average 20,947 electors, while every representative of Victoria will represent 27,969.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. SALMON.—That is a disparity which I feel sure was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

Mr. McCAY.—As the Prime Minister cheers this remark, he ought to withdraw the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Is that the honorable and learned member's idea of logic?

Mr. SALMON.—Surely some consideration should be given to the electoral strength of a State?

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member's figures are wrong, for the average number represented by a member from New South Wales would be not 20,947, but 24,666.

Mr. SALMON.—I did not know that these figures were available until a few moments ago, when I obtained them from the Minister of Home Affairs, and I am prepared to accept the honorable and learned member's correction.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The disparity to which the honorable member has referred is due largely to the impossibility of effecting a complete collection in the larger States, where the population is scattered.

Mr. SALMON.—I would point out to the honorable member that we have the same system of collection in Victoria that is in operation in New South Wales, and that it would be just as fair to assume that those making the enumeration in Victoria were remiss in their duty as it would be to make that assumption concerning those carrying out the work in New South Wales.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I have shown that the difference between the total population and the proportion of electors in Victoria was only 3 per cent., whereas in the case of New South Wales, it was 6 per cent.

Mr. SALMON.—That, after all, is a difference of only 3 per cent. The figures I have quoted are substantially correct, and have been issued, I understand, by the Department of Home Affairs.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am not questioning them; I am simply referring to the causes of the difference.

Mr. SALMON.—I do not think that we are at present concerned with the causes of the difference. The fact stares us in the face that we are controlled and governed by figures compiled by officers acting under the same instructions. These are going to govern our representation in the future. They will not take into account causes; they will give us the actual facts. When we have a remarkable disparity, such as has been shown to exist between the figures compiled by the Statisticians and the census returns, we have reason to say that more consideration should be given to this matter. I feel sure that no honorable member representing New South Wales would feel justified in sitting in this House if he knew that he represented a considerably smaller number of electors than were represented by the members returned by other States. I urge that before any step is taken under this Bill, some provision should be made to give weight to the facts which I have stated, so that a procedure, which I feel sure must be distasteful to all, will not be carried out—I speak, not of a State not being entitled to another member, but of a State being deprived of a member. In conclusion, just a word with regard to the compilation of these figures. Ten years is a very short term indeed in the life of a nation, and we should guard against the tremendous upheavals which, in a young country like this, where so large a proportion of the population moves from place to place, may occur with too frequent alterations of the representation of the States. We must remember that those who move from place to place still remain electors of the Commonwealth, and their interests are Commonwealth interests. We should not, therefore, alter the basis of representation unless we have indisputable evidence that the alteration is warranted.

Mr. KELLY.—Are not the statistics indisputable evidence?

Mr. SALMON.—Yes, and I ask for statistics. I agree with the honorable member that we should rely only on statistics. We should not be content with calculations.

Mr. McCAY.—What does the honorable member mean by "statistics"—an actual count?

Mr. SALMON.—An actual count.

Mr. McCAY.—The figures we have got are the result of an actual count, all except a small percentage.

Mr. SALMON.—I am surprised to hear the honorable and learned member say that. In the past there have been some glaring instances in which these so-called actual counts have been carried out in the most perfunctory and partial manner, with the intention of advancing one State before another. We have had estimates of the population of New South Wales which need only be compared with the actual census returns to cover the compilers with ridicule.

Mr. McCAY.—The New South Wales figures were only 12,000 out on a ten years' count.

Mr. McCAY.—No; on a ten years' count—from 1891 to 1901.

Mr. SALMON.—I am sorry that I have not with me the figures which were compiled by Senator Styles, but I would commend them to the consideration of the honorable and learned member, who will find that they were most carefully compiled, and taken from reliable sources, and they contain no mistakes in addition. Those figures will make a very big fence for him to get over. If he is prepared to accept the system of guesswork followed by the States for many years past, and call that an enumeration, I am not. The census enumeration is the only method which we should adopt. With regard to electoral representation, I know that that matter is not now under consideration; but, incidentally, I should like to say that it should be regulated as circumstances arise to make that necessary. With regard to the greater and larger question, the States representation should, in my opinion, not be altered at this time, because it depends on an entirely different system. Electoral representation depends on the collection of electoral rolls; but the representation of the States, if we adopt the system now proposed, will depend very largely on figures which are the result of guesswork, and not on figures which have been properly compiled. You cannot say that you have ascertained the facts, if you accept figures which have been guessed at. In order to ascertain that a thing exists, its existence must be proved, and the various changes in our population cannot be ascertained by accepting mere estimates. I recognise that it is of hardly any use to speak against a Government measure, but I feel certain that Parliament, by passing this Bill, will commit an act which it will have cause subsequently to regret. I feel that a mistake is being made, and that the tremendous interests at stake are being jeopardized to secure a very small gain to one particular State. I think, too, that the good feeling which we should endeavour to promote between the States will not be assisted by the events which must follow in the train of this measure. I should have very much preferred the Government to say that they were not prepared to accept the position laid down by their predecessors, and to take the estimates of population as ascertained information; but that they would propose a rearrangement of the electorates, and leave the representation of the States as it is until the end of the decennial period.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I am very glad that the Bill has been introduced, because it provides for representation on a fairer basis than we have at present. At the same time, I hold that all that was needed was to put into effect the provisions of the Electoral Act of 1902. Owing to a cause into which it is unnecessary for me to enter now, the representation of three of the States of the Commonwealth is based upon statistics compiled nine years after the census of 1891 was taken, and since we were content to accept such figures for the first Federal Parliament, I think we need hardly quarrel with figures compiled only four years subsequent to the taking of a census, especially in view of the fact that the Statisticians of the States have met together, and agreed to make certain additions and corrections, which the figures of the census showed to be necessary. The error in our statistics under the former method of compilation amounted to less than  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent., I believe, when compared with the census, and in future it will be still less. With regard to my statement that it would have been sufficient to put into effect the provisions of the Commonwealth Electoral Act, I would urge, in the first place, that we had certainly power to pass that Act. It provides that each State shall be distributed into electoral divisions, equal in number to the number of the members of the House of Representatives, each division to return a member. Commissioners were to be appointed for the purposes of this distribution—under the Bill, the Chief Electoral Officer is so appointed. Then a quota was laid down, as determined by the Constitution. The trouble from which we are at present suffering arose in connexion with the distribution of the States into divisions, because, unfortunately, it was left to Parliament to determine whether it would or would not accept the proposals of the Commissioners, and the Bill has a similar provision. Therefore, the interests of individual members were brought into conflict with their judgment, and the experience of last Parliament proved that when that happens, interest will generally prevail over judgment. The suggestions which were made in regard to the proposed redistribution of the three great States presented even greater difficulties than the distributions proposed by the Commissioners, showing clearly that, in refusing to accept the distributions of the Commissioners, honorable members were acting contrarily to their judgment, because their interests had been brought into play. The result has been that one State has been able to retain a representative to which it is not entitled, and another State has been deprived of a representative to which it is entitled, which is by far the greater evil. To my mind, the only need for bringing in a Bill of this kind is to declare certain statistics Commonwealth statistics. However, I shall not quarrel with the introduction of the measure. I regret that it was not brought in long ago, or advantage taken of the Electoral Act, and, therefore, I shall give it my hearty support. I am not certain, however, that the period of ten years is too long to allow to elapse between the readjustment of the representation of the States. I would ask the Minister of Home Affairs to insert a clause providing that when States are distributed into divisions by the Electoral Commissioner appointed for that purpose, this Parliament shall not have the right to say whether his redistribution shall be accepted.

Mr. GROOM.—The honorable and learned member will have an opportunity of discussing that question when the Electoral Bill comes before us.

Mr. CONROY.—If some such provision is not made, we shall experience the same difficulty that was met with when the last distribution scheme was before us. On that occasion members' interests conflicted with their judgment to such an extent that, upon one pretext or another, the distributions proposed were rejected. I prophesied that that would be the result, and my forecast proved so accurate that I am almost justified in saying that, unless we provide proper safeguards in connexion with the present measure, it will probably fail to achieve the results expected, and we shall have again to go to the country upon the same conditions as previously. We shall not advance the cause of redistribution as thoroughly as we ought to do unless the Minister determines to make its provisions of an automatic character, by insuring that the Commissioner's decision should be final. The provision in the Electoral Act, that objections may be lodged against the distribution proposed by the Commissioner within thirty days of its publication, is quite sufficient.

Mr. CHANTER.—Suppose the Commissioner takes no notice of objections?

Mr. CONROY.—But he is bound to take some notice of them. It is highly undesirable that honorable members should be able to sit in judgment upon proposed alterations that may affect their seats. I shall support the Bill, in the hope that some provision will be made to guard against the difficulties which arose in connexion with the Electoral Act. If that course is not taken, some difficulty may crop up at the last minute which will prevent a redistribution of seats being made prior to the next general election, and the work we are now doing will thus be entirely lost.

Mr. WILSON (Corangamite).—I think it is to be regretted that we are not able to redistribute the electoral divisions upon the basis of the decennial census. When we consider, however, the disparities that exist between the electorates, both in Victoria and other States, we must recognise the necessity for some change before the next election. It appears to me that we have no other recourse than to follow the provisions of the Constitution, and make a redistribution of seats according to the numbers of people in the various States. I am sorry that the State of Victoria has ceased to progress in the matter of population in the same ratio as have the other States. I must congratulate the representatives of New South Wales upon the fact that the population of that State has largely increased, and I should like to direct their attention to the fact that that increase has taken place during the operation of a protective Tariff.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member not to discuss that question.

Mr. WILSON.—We are dealing with the increase of population in some of the States, and I think that it is perfectly relevant to discuss the causes which have led to such increases.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is perfectly in order for honorable members to refer to the relative increases or decreases which have taken place in the populations of the various States, but if honorable members were permitted to discuss the reasons for any such increases or decreases, it would be competent for them to debate the whole of the questions mentioned in section 51 of the Constitution.

Mr. WILSON.—I must bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and content myself by saying that the fact I have stated is a most interesting one. I should like to direct the attention of the House to the fact already noted by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, that the Attorney-General, before he became a member of the Government, condemned the principles embodied in the measure, whereas it is to be assumed that he now accepts them in their entirety. I should like very much to follow the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and the honorable and learned member for Angas, but I think that owing to the immediate necessity for a redistribution of seats we cannot wait for the next decennial census. Therefore, I shall support the Bill.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—In connexion with this question, we have had a very striking proof of the fact that lawyers, like doctors, may differ. I confess that I have been in a very confused state of mind with regard to this question for some time past. Until recently I was disposed to follow those constitutional authorities who have taken up an attitude in opposition to the principles of the measure before us, but in view of the fact that the present Attorney-General has to a great extent backed down from the position he formerly took up—

Mr. HIGGINS.—He has not said so.

Mr. GROOM.—He declared that parliamentary action was necessary.

Mr. SKENE.—I assume that the Attorney-General is in accord with this Bill, which, so far as I can see, is upon exactly the same lines as the proposal made by the previous Government to which he objected.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Attorney-General has not stated that he has changed his opinion.

Mr. SKENE.—If he has not changed his opinion, he has adopted a different attitude. Matters must have been pretty well muddled from the first if we have to be dependent for our statistical information entirely upon the decennial census returns. If the seats had been distributed in the first instance upon the basis of the census returns, I should have had no hesitation in continuing to rely upon them, but as they were distributed upon statistical returns such as it is now suggested shall be used, and as the disparities between the electorates are now so serious, I think we should proceed at once to remove the existing anomalies. One point strikes me with considerable force, namely, that whilst the population of Victoria is smaller than that of New South Wales, the number of voters in the mother State is proportionately less than in Victoria. However, I do not regard that as affording any ground for cavilling at the proposed redistribution of seats, as the Constitution lays it down distinctly that the distribution must be on a population basis, and not on the number of voters.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That is accounted for by the fact that in Victoria there are 2 per cent. more persons over the age of twenty-one than in New South Wales.

Mr. SKENE.—In view of the fact that we adopted the latest statistics available to us for the purpose of distributing the seats in the first instance, we cannot reasonably object to adopt a similar course now. I cannot understand how the returns are worked out. According to the evidence given before the Old-Age Pensions Commission there is in Victoria a much greater number of persons between the ages of sixty and sixty-five than in New South Wales. Why that should be so I do not know, but that seems to me to throw some doubt upon the accuracy of our statistical information.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Those figures are taken from the census.

Mr. SKENE.—I fancy they are; but, nevertheless, the results appear to me to work out very curiously. In view of the fact that New South Wales is an older State, one would imagine that within it there would be a larger proportion of persons between the ages of sixty and sixty-five.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But the influx of population into New South Wales consists of younger people.

Mr. SKENE.—This is not a matter of percentage. It is a mere question of whether there are more people between sixty and sixty-five years of age in New South Wales than there are in Victoria. The figures which have been placed before the Old-Age Pensions Commission certainly show that there are more in the latter State. I should be very glad indeed if I could see my way to prevent the loss of a representative to Victoria. In that respect I occupy a similar position to the honorable and learned member for Corinella. Seeing, however, that there is such a large discrepancy between our own electorates—that some of those electorates contain double the number of voters to be found in others—there is certain reason for a redistribution of seats, and therefore I feel that I must vote with the Government upon this Bill.

Mr. SALMON.—This is not a Bill to effect a redistribution of seats.

Mr. SKENE.—Practically it is.

Mr. KELLY.—It is a Bill to decide the redistribution in each State.

Mr. SKENE.—That is what is at the bottom of the measure.

Mr. GROOM.—There must be a redistribution of seats before the next general election.

Mr. SKENE.—I quite realize that that is so.

Mr. SALMON.—If this Bill were not carried it would still be possible to effect a redistribution of seats.

Mr. McCAY.—The first information which the Government would have to give its Commissioner would be with reference to the number of seats.

Mr. SKENE.—Seeing that upon a former occasion the representation of the States was determined upon the basis of the statistical returns, it is only right that the proposed redistribution should be based upon the latest similar returns.

Mr. HIGGINS.—As between the States we must have resort to the latest statistics.

Mr. SKENE.—There are later statistics than those upon which the original distribution of seats was based. Upon a former occasion I objected very strongly to any redistribution, because of the abnormal condition of things which had obtained consequent upon the drought. I honestly believed that a great many people left the country districts and crowded into the towns, and therefore I opposed the scheme submitted by a previous Government. That position of affairs, however, is now past. People have returned to their homes, and matters have resumed their normal condition. The objection which I then raised cannot be honestly urged now. In spite of an inclination to lean a little towards my own State, I feel that the figures are against me, and that consequently I must vote in favour of the Bill.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moirā).—It is not my intention to speak at length upon this measure. It is generally admitted that, prior to the first general election for this Parliament, we had not accurate figures as to the population of the various States. That position, to my mind, is about to be accentuated by the deliberate act of this House. Instead of obtaining reliable statistics of population, we are about to resort to mere estimates. What was condemned as an improper act on the part of the late Government is now about to be regarded as a very proper act. I contend that if it was wrong for the late Government to propose the redistribution of seats upon mere estimates, it is equally wrong for the present Ministry to do so. The last census returns compiled by the States showed that the estimates upon which the first Commonwealth Parliament was elected were to some extent inaccurate. The same condition of affairs obtains to-day. Surely in laying down a new procedure it is desirable that we should have a reliable basis! I do not feel disposed to vote against the Bill, knowing that it is absolutely necessary that we should provide some machinery to meet the exigencies of the present situation. I do not find fault with those who say that, under the operation of the measure, it is probable that Victoria will lose a representative in this House. If the figures show that she is not entitled to that representative, I shall offer no objection. If, on the contrary, New South Wales is entitled to an additional representative, I say that her right should not be denied to her. Before proceeding, however, to redistribute the seats, I claim that we should have the most reliable data upon which to act. In Committee, I shall make a determined effort to incorporate that mode of procedure in the Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I only wish to say a few words, and those not in derogation of the Bill, which I hope to see passed as speedily as possible. I quite agree with the honorable member for Moira, that this measure affords the most complete justification of the action taken by the late Government. Now that the present Ministry are taking precisely the same course as that adopted by their predecessors—now that they are crystallizing into a statute what the Reid-McLean Government did by Executive act, there is no ground for complaint, although the Bill does not take us very much further forward in regard to the work of redistributing the electorates. In itself, the measure seems to me to be incomplete. I should have liked to see the Government carry the matter further, or else incorporate the provisions of this Bill in a section of the Electoral Act, and place it upon the statute-book as such. The measure does not in reality declare that there shall be a redistribution of seats, that the electorates shall be recast, so as to more accurately represent the basis of our democracy—namely, the adult vote of the Commonwealth. It merely provides for the enumeration of the voting power of the Commonwealth, and leaves the matter there. When the Commonwealth officer has furnished his certificate, and the matter has received the approval of the Executive, and been published in the Commonwealth

Gazette, there it ends. Unless the House or the Government take the initiative, this Bill will be valueless, so far as any practical purpose is concerned. I understood the Minister of Home Affairs to say that he intends to introduce another Bill, which contemplates action in the way of giving effect to what is achieved by this Bill. That is all I am concerned about. I trust that the Government will make it clear that they intend to lose no more time in dallying with this great subject of the redistribution of the electoral power of the Commonwealth. It is high time that that work was carried out. We have been here for five years, working upon a basis which is unsatisfactory from every point of view.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That remark does not apply to every State.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It applies to every State, with the exception of Western Australia, where these anomalies have been rectified. I hope that this Bill represents only a prelude to action, which will take us to the completion of the matter, and without which all our legislative arrangements will be vitiated by reason of the continued unequal distribution of the electoral power of the Commonwealth. There are one or two points connected with this measure to which attention may profitably be given in Committee, and, therefore, I do not intend to deal with them now. I am glad that the Government are taking steps in the direction indicated by the Bill, and I am pleased to have heard from honorable members upon both sides of the Chamber a complete justification of the action taken by the late Government, which provoked so much momentary adverse criticism from some honorable members, who now appear to favour these proposals, and who seem to be quite docile in regard to a matter profoundly affecting their own State.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It was merely this, and nothing more, with the last Government.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The late Government proposed to submit the whole scheme definitely to the House. As the honorable member has mentioned that point, I confess that I fail to see any necessity for this Bill. The question could be just as effectively discussed if it were embodied in a scheme for redistributing the electoral power of the Commonwealth as it can be when it is dealt with in a separate measure. We are only doing sectionally and piecemeal what the late Government proposed to do completely. I submit that the proposals of the Reid-McLean Administration were very much in advance of those contained in this Bill. Indeed, without some such proposal as was made by the late Administration to bring about a redistribution scheme, this measure would represent so much waste paper. It is strange that the Bill should proceed from a Government, some of whose members bitterly denounced the former proposal. However, it does not matter to me where proposals originate, so long as they are in accord with the opinion of the House, that as soon as possible a revolution should be made in our electoral system, which now drags so heavily on the Commonwealth, and which, so far, has done nothing but vitiate our legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon).—When the late Government, through the press, announced their intention to submit a Redistribution of Seats Bill, I was very much opposed to their proposal. I followed with some interest the opinions expressed in the newspapers by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, the present Attorney-General, and Mr. Irvine, M.L.A. I must say, however, that the most convincing and elaborate argument which has been adduced by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, has effected a great change in my views. I feel that, although the loss of a representative to Victoria is a very serious one, Victorians would not be justified in opposing this measure upon that ground alone. It must not be forgotten that the present electorates in Victoria and New South Wales were, to a very large extent, formed as the result of mere guesswork. It was never anticipated by the Parliaments of those States, which defined the electorates, that the Commonwealth Legislature would continue to maintain them for any length of time. For instance, the constituency which I represent was created by combining three or four State electorates, and by restricting the boundaries of the Commonwealth electorate to those of the State, irrespective of any alteration in the franchise which this Parliament might adopt. The Federal Parliament has adopted a totally different franchise, and that means that the number of electors in the different constituencies varies much more than is contemplated by the Federal Electoral Act. That being so, it is only a question of time when the Federal Parliament must rearrange the constituencies in each State.

When we do that we shall have to inquire into the question of the total representation of that State, as compared with that of the others. We come now to the basis on which the representation of the States should be calculated. I have listened with interest to the remarks made by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and, so far as I followed him—I trust that I am not doing him an injustice—he appeared to be of opinion that the words “the latest statistics,” in the section of the Constitution governing this matter, must refer to a census enumeration.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Not necessarily; but our principal mode of obtaining statistics is by way of the census. So far as the Commonwealth is concerned, I think that the latest statistics available are those of 1901.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That is a matter upon which different opinions are held, and the honorable and learned member for Corinella has already explained to the House the reason why he differs from the honorable and learned member in this respect. It seems to me that there is one aspect of the question which is of some importance, and which relates to the fact that the new expenditure of the Commonwealth is distributed upon a per capita basis. It is rather incongruous that we should distribute the new expenditure upon a per capita basis, according to certain figures, and yet rearrange our representation upon a totally different set of statistics. If we adopt the latest returns in the one case we ought to do so in the other. It must be admitted that there is a certain amount of guesswork in the matter of the Statisticians' returns; but the more experience these officers gain the less will be their liability to make errors in their calculations. The census of 1901 enabled them to recast their methods of checking errors, and I have no doubt that the possibility of mistakes has been very considerably reduced. It must not be forgotten, however, that even the census cannot give us accuracy, and that there must be, comparatively speaking, a large number of persons who are omitted from the returns. We cannot, under any method, obtain mathematical accuracy, and it seems to me that although the basis of the calculation which is to be followed in this case is injurious to Victoria, it is one to which we cannot object. I was, at first, very much opposed to it, but after hearing the arguments that have been advanced in favour of it, and having regard to the fact that the first Parliament practically indorsed a proposal by a totally different Government to adopt the same method of procedure, I feel it my duty not to oppose the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi—Attorney-General).—As my name has been mentioned during the debate, I should like to say a word or two before the question is put. It is not correct that I have changed my opinion, in the slightest degree, in regard to this matter. The first objection I had to the course proposed by the late Government was that it was intended to deal with this question by Executive act. Now, I consider that any step taken towards altering the representation of a country by Executive act is inherently wrong.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable and learned gentleman did not object to the Barton Administration adopting that course.

Mr. ISAACS.—That was not an attempt to alter the representation of the country; it was an internal division of the representation of each State, which is a totally different matter.

Mr. MCCAY.—No, it was for this very purpose.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am perfectly clear on the point.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable and learned gentleman is quite right.

Mr. MCCAY.—By a fluke it did not make any alteration.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am quite certain that I am perfectly correct. There is a vast difference between the two proposals. I should like to say, however, that whether it was, or was not, done then, it is, in my opinion, an inherently wrong course to adopt. No Ministry should have it in its power, at its own will, to alter, or to commence to alter, or to prevent an alteration of, any due representation of the country.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The late Government did not have that power, because Parliament would have had to sanction their proposal before it could be put into effect.

Mr. ISAACS.—I should like to point out to the honorable member, if he will permit me to do so, why my statement is correct.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But Parliament would have had an opportunity to reject the proposal.

Mr. ISAACS.—If the Reid-McLean Administration had thought that the estimate showed that New South Wales would lose a member, they might—I do not say that they would, but they might—have refrained from making any proposal for an alteration—

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That is a very improper suggestion to make.

Mr. ISAACS.—Will the honorable member allow me to complete the sentence? I am merely citing a supposititious case as an illustration of my point, and am not seeking to apply it to any particular Government. If it be left to a Ministry to say that they may bring forward such proposals when they like, and if they like, then, although they cannot carry them without the assent of Parliament, they can refuse to give the Parliament an opportunity to carry them.

Mr. McCAY.—And that was what the late Government was asked to do.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am not commenting on the act of an individual Government; I am speaking only of the principle, and say that such a power as this should not be given to any Executive. The great principle of the Bill lies in the fact that it takes it out of the power of any Government to deal with this question; that it places the whole matter in the hands of the Parliament itself, and of officers of the Government, who have no political feeling whatever.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Government may still ignore this enumeration.

Mr. ISAACS.—Under the Bill they cannot do so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They might, for anything the Bill contains.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member is under a misapprehension, and I would advise him to read the Bill. The point, however, is one to be dealt with in Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable and learned gentleman show me anything in the Bill that would prevent the Government from ignoring the enumeration?

Mr. ISAACS.—I shall be prepared to do so when we go into Committee. With regard to the question of enumeration, I say distinctly that the scheme adopted in the Bill is no mere guesswork and no mere estimate. If the other view be taken, and it is said that we are to be guided only by the census, I must reply that, in my opinion, such a contention is not warranted by the Constitution. I quite agree with the honorable and learned member for Corinella when he says that a clear distinction is drawn between the words "census" and "statistics"; but I think that a little consideration will show that, if we provided in the Bill that there should be a redistribution as between the States only after a census, it might lead to a very great wrong being done.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I do not think any one urges that we should go as far as that.

Mr. ISAACS.—Let me point out why I think some such scheme as that which we have adopted is inevitable. Recollecting that the Parliament is elected for three years, let us imagine what would be the position if a Parliament were elected, and lived its full life, and two succeeding Parliaments lived their full lives, or nine years in all. Then let us suppose that the succeeding Parliament, in the first year of its existence, found that a census had been taken. In that event surely we would not dissolve the Parliament immediately; we should not say, "We want a new Parliament, because a new census has been taken." If we did not do so—if we allowed that Parliament to live its full life, and in the meantime a great change of population took place, say, in Western Australia—

Mr. WILKS. — Or was caused by a drought.

Mr. ISAACS.—Quite so. In those circumstances, surely we should not adhere to the bare figures of the census that were published in the first year of the life of that Parliament. We are to take the last census, and also not what A or B says are, or what any Ministry chooses to pass by way of regulation and call, "Commonwealth statistics," but what Parliament declares to be "Commonwealth statistics."

Mr. McCAY. — Has the honorable and learned gentleman ever heard of the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee?

Mr. ISAACS.—It is the difference between legality and illegality—the difference between Parliament exercising its powers and not doing so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The difference between responsible government and irresponsible government.

Mr. ISAACS.—The difference between a Government obeying the law and not doing so. The Parliament has it in its power to say what shall be deemed statistics and what shall not be so regarded. It is not in the power of a Government to determine that matter. When the Constitution gives Parliament certain powers, it does not say that those powers shall be exercised at the will of the Executive. Therefore we say that, inasmuch as we could never allow the Parliament to be elected on the bare figures of a census—which might be declared, perhaps, for all we might know, a week after it was elected—and not take into consideration the great changes which might take place within the next three years, there is no other course open to us than that of coming down to Parliament with these proposals, leaving the Parliament to say what shall be declared statistics.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — To legalize guesses.

Mr. ISAACS.—No.

Mr. McCAY.—Hazy, indefinite guesses.

Mr. ISAACS.—Certainly not. I say that this calculation—

Mr. McCAY. — The honorable and learned gentleman spoke of the calculation now adopted as a "hazy, indefinite guess."

Mr. ISAACS.—I am quite sure that my honorable and learned friend will admit that, when the Reid-McLean Government declared their proposal, the country had no means whatever to ascertain how these figures were arrived at.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The position was exactly the same as it is now.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am sorry that my honorable friends are becoming uncomfortable.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable and learned gentleman knows now that the figures were ascertained in a certain way.

Mr. ISAACS.—I accept my honorable and learned friend's word. But that does not take us away from the position that the course proposed by the late Government was absolutely unwarranted, because the Constitution does not place it in the hands of any seven or eight members sitting round the Council table to declare what shall be the law for this country. If the Parliament chooses to say that statistics shall be gathered in a certain way—it may or may not be by enumeration—we may thus secure the statistics of the Commonwealth. We accept statistics relating, for example, to grain, but we do not count the grains in or weigh every bushel. There is a great distinction between a "census" and "statistics," and consequently when two different words are used in the Constitution, it remains for the Parliament to say what, in its opinion, shall be declared, by way of legislation, to be the statistics of the Commonwealth. When the Parliament has declared what shall be regarded as Commonwealth statistics, the words of the Constitution are satisfied. If honorable members can find a more accurate way of arriving at the population of the Commonwealth, I shall be very glad to hear of it; and if any State which fears that its representation may be affected chooses to declare its own census—because under this Bill provision is made for the census of any State being taken, pending the taking of a Commonwealth census—I shall also be very pleased. I have only to say, in conclusion, that I have not changed my views. On the contrary, I have expressed the opinion before, and express it again, that it is necessary to arrive at the population on a legal basis, as provided by the Constitution, and the Government has taken that course.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time.

In Committee:

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2—

For the purpose of determining the number of members of the House of Representatives to be chosen from time to time in the several States, the Chief Electoral Officer of the Commonwealth shall, at the times and in the manner prescribed by this Act, ascertain the numbers of the people of the Commonwealth, and the numbers of the people of the several States.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne). —I did not like to take the extreme step of calling for a division against the second reading of the Bill, but the Prime Minister has agreed that this clause affords a convenient opportunity to test the question whether the Committee approves of the substitution of the certificate of the Chief Electoral Officer of the Commonwealth as to the numbers of the people for the statistics provided for in this case by the Constitution. I need hardly say that no argument was adduced during the second-reading debate in justification of the position that the certificate of the Chief Electoral Officer should be the same thing as the "latest statistics of the Commonwealth." Clause 2, and so much of the Bill as is consequent upon, or incidental to it, must be void if it is in contradiction of the Constitution, no matter what honorable members may think, or how they may vote, although, as it is hard to conceive how any Court can come to deal with the question, it is improbable that it will ever be tested. There was evident, however, during the second-reading debate, a good deal of misunderstanding in regard to the purpose of the Bill. For instance, the honorable member for Grampians seemed to think that in voting for it he was voting for the redistribution of the Victorian electorates. Of course, it is clear, from clause 10, that if the Bill be carried into law, it will have to be followed by a measure for the redistribution of the electorates of the States.

Mr. GROOM.—All that will be necessary will be a proclamation under the Electoral Act.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Assuming that the number of members to be chosen in each State is fixed at twenty-two for Victoria, there will have to be a redistribution of electorates in this State.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Electoral Act will cover that.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes; but my point is that we are not now making provision for the redistribution of the electorates of any State. This is a Bill "relating to the representation of the several States of the House of Representatives," and clause 2 provides for an inquiry as to the population of the several States—for the purpose of determining the number of members of the House of Representatives to be chosen from time to time in the several States.

I adhere still more strongly now than I did originally to the position which I took up when first I understood the scheme now proposed to take the certificate of the Chief Electoral Officer as the latest statistics. It may be difficult to say what would be the latest statistics, and indeed all sorts of difficulties might be raised, but I am confident that the certificate of the Chief Electoral Officer is not the latest statistics.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The latest available statistics.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The words of the Constitution are "the latest statistics." Of course they must be available. The language of clause 9 is taken almost word for word from section 24 of the Constitution, but paragraphs a and b contain a very significant change of words. Paragraph a says that—

A quota shall be ascertained by dividing the number of people of the Commonwealth, as shown by the certificate (for the time being in force) of the Chief Electoral Officer, by twice the number of senators, while the Constitution says that a quota shall be ascertained by dividing the number of people of the Commonwealth "as shown by the latest statistics." The words in paragraph b are the same as those in the Constitution, except for a similar substitution. Therefore an attempt is being made to amend the Constitution by a mere Act of Parliament. I warned honorable members in connexion with the Judiciary Bill that they were going wrong, and it has been determined by the Court that they did go wrong, and, so far as one can, without presumption, speak confidently on a matter of this sort, I say that this provision is absolutely void. In my opinion, the correct course, since there has been no enumeration since the census of 1901, is to act on the basis of that census, though I am strongly of opinion that we should have an enumeration or census as often as we can consistently with the keeping down of expense, and I am glad that the Government proposes to take a census at least once in every five years. Another point I would suggest for consideration is this: There is no Commonwealth collection of statistics, and, although the Statisticians of the States are at present in agreement, it does not follow that they will always be so. It might happen that there would be differences between the figures of the Statist of New South Wales and those of the Statist of Victoria or Queensland, so that one would criticise the returns of another, and we should have no solid basis of certainty to act on. Where, then, should we find the "latest statistics?" I do not wish to argue the question at length, since it was discussed very fully on the second reading, but I am anxious, and so I understand are several others, to enter a decided protest against the proposal, by voting against this clause. That, I think, is a better course to adopt than to seek to insert an elaborate amendment. Of course, we must be beaten, because when a Government adopts the proposals of its predecessors it is bound to win. This Government has chosen that path as the way of least resistance, and I have no doubt will carry its proposals into effect. But some of us would like to be allowed to enter as emphatic a protest as we can make against what we regard as a mistake. The question whether Victoria will, or will not, lose a member is not of importance, but I do not wish to be a party to what I regard as an illegal and unconstitutional act which is being proposed in defiance of opinions expressed by Ministers themselves.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—I understand that the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne objects to our proposals on the ground that to say that the certificate of the Chief Electoral Officer as to the number of the people of the Commonwealth and of the several States, made as provided by the Bill, shall be regarded as the latest statistics, is to provide something contrary to the principles of the Constitution, and therefore void. With all respect, I must differ from him on that point. In the first place, Parliament was empowered by paragraph xi. of section 51 of the Constitution to legislate with respect to census and statistics, that is, we possess an inherent power to declare what are and what are not statistics, or, rather, to provide how our statistics shall be ascertained, collected, gathered, or compiled.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Have we power to declare that a horse is a sheep?

Mr. GROOM.—We have power to adopt statistics which have been collected by the States, and to declare that for our purposes they shall be the statistics of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I wish the Government to take the statistics which were compiled at the last census.

Mr. GROOM.—That is being done.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But the Bill goes further.

Mr. GROOM.—Our starting point is an enumeration of the people which took place in 1901, and to gain the latest statistics on enumeration day, we give authority to the Statisticians of the States to send in returns showing births and deaths. These returns are statistical returns. Further than that, Parliament says that an account shall be taken of the arrivals and departures by land and sea. These are recorded facts, and when the returns are made up they constitute statistics.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But suppose a man crossed the border in a private vehicle?

Mr. GROOM.—In every statistical department certain allowances are made for possibilities of error, and by the law of averages, these errors are brought down to an irreducible minimum. Even in the case of an enumeration, there are omissions. Therefore, I do not think that this proposal can be regarded as unconstitutional.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But I say that it is unconstitutional.

Mr. GROOM.—It cannot be urged that the whole of it is unconstitutional. The honorable and learned member will admit that the census is constitutional, and that the returns relating to the registration of births and deaths would be statistical.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Not for the purposes of the Constitution.

Mr. GROOM.—I submit that if we adopt the latest statistical information we can obtain—

Mr. HIGGINS.—It must be the latest statistical information obtainable for the Commonwealth, as a whole.

Mr. GROOM.—With all due respect to my honorable and learned friend, I submit that we are exercising power we undoubtedly possess, to declare that certain State returns, which are furnished in accordance with certain prescribed methods, shall be regarded as Commonwealth statistics for any purpose we may deem fit. I join issue with the honorable and learned member when he says that we are endeavouring to avoid friction. We are endeavouring to work out a fair and equitable principle for the period between each census. In the first place, we say that the decennial period is too long, and that it is necessary to split up that interval. We are adopting the census as a guide whenever it is available to us, but in the intervals we propose to rely upon the statistics collected by the methods prescribed by the Bill. We contend that it would be too costly to have a census taken every fifth year, at a cost of £117,000, or upwards. I think that we should keep ourselves as much as possible in touch with the distribution of people throughout the Commonwealth, and insure their proper representation.

Mr. WEBSTER.—In ten years hence, New South Wales will probably be entitled to five more representatives.

Mr. GROOM.—Then they should be granted to her. The position which New South Wales now occupies may be filled by Victoria or Queensland on the occasion of some future redistribution. No one can tell how far the population of Victoria may be increased, if certain irrigation schemes are carried out, and land now regarded as useless is brought under cultivation. I submit that we are not attempting to avoid friction, or to win support, but are endeavouring to lay down fixed principles upon which the redistribution shall take place.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think the Government felt themselves bound by the promise that there would be a redistribution.

Mr. GROOM.—We felt bound by the provision in the Constitution that, whenever necessary, there shall be a determination of the proportion of the representatives of the States. We also felt bound to lay down certain definite lines upon which such proportion should be determined, and when. There is nothing specific in the Constitution to define when a redistribution shall or shall not be necessary; the only inference is that, as soon as the returns obtained from various sources show that the representation is not proportionate, action shall be taken. The Constitution does not specify that action shall be taken at any fixed period, but we desire to lay down rules which will put an end to all uncertainty on that subject. There is nothing in the Constitution as to the period at which the redistribution shall take place, but we are told that we should rely, for the purposes of our calculation, on the latest statistics of the Commonwealth. It appears to me that the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has taken a very narrow view of the construction to be placed upon the words "latest statistics."

Mr. HIGGINS.—I say that they must be statistics and not estimates.

Mr. GROOM.—I admit that there may be a dispute as to what constitute statistics, but our desire is to place the matter beyond all dispute.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But I contend that that cannot be done.

Mr. GROOM.—I claim that we are exercising the undoubted power of the Commonwealth Parliament to lay down rules.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The wording of the Constitution cannot be altered.

Mr. GROOM.—Section 24 provides—

The number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people, and shall, until the Parliament otherwise provides, be determined whenever necessary—in a certain manner. Parliament is now being asked under the authority of this section to "provide" that the population of the States shall be ascertained at one period from the census and at another period by the methods prescribed in the Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But Parliament cannot alter the meaning of the word "statistics."

Mr. GROOM.—We are not attempting to do so, but we are recognising the statistics of the various States, and are making them Commonwealth statistics for the purpose of determining the representation of the people.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—If I rightly understand the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, he takes up the position that no alteration should be made in the representation of the States unless the latest statistics of the Commonwealth show that it ought to take place. He contends, further, that the latest statistics referred to must take the form of a systematic enumeration of the people of the Commonwealth. Do I understand the honorable and learned member to mean that there must be an enumeration of the whole of the people?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes.

Mr. McCAY.—Then I would put this position to him. If it is ascertained by counting that there are 100 persons in a room, and tellers are placed at the various entrances or exits to count those going in and out, and it is afterwards found that twenty people enter the room and ten leave the room, would the honorable and learned member regard as statistics the net total of 110 persons arrived at by a process of addition and subtraction?

Mr. HIGGINS.—They would not be statistics within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. McCAY.—I understand the honorable and learned member to say that the 110 people must be counted over again in order to produce statistics which would be recognised within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS.—All I say is that the returns which are to be relied upon under the Bill are not statistics. I am not bound to say what would be statistics.

Mr. McCAY.—I will put another case. In 1901, we counted the people actually in Australia, and stationed tellers at all our entrances and exits to count all the people coming in and going out. We have also kept a record of births and deaths, and by a process of addition and subtraction we have arrived at a computation as to our present population. It seems to me that the results are statistics within the fullest meaning of the term. Further, it seems to me that the position taken up by the honorable and learned member is that if the Bill made no allowances for error, the calculations referred to would be statistics, but because it does make allowances for error, and thus brings about a closer approach to accuracy, the returns proposed to be used are not statistics. In other words, the honorable and learned member says that because the figures may be wrong they are not statistics. But I venture to say that they are statistics, even though they may be wrong. Our experience has shown that there are actual exits and entrances for which no provision has been made, and I prefer figures which are subject to certain allowances for unrecorded arrivals and departures, rather than figures which are compiled upon arbitrary lines. I think that the Minister placed himself upon the horns of a dilemma, because he said in the first place that the number of persons to be chosen should be in proportion to the respective numbers of the people, and at the same time he implied that the moment any change of population occurred we must arrange for a change of representation accordingly.

Mr. GROOM.—I said that a strict construction of the words "whenever necessary" might lead to that conclusion.

Mr. McCAY.—Then the Minister said that as it would be only fair to alter the representation as the population changed, he would refrain from ascertaining whether there was any alteration in the population except at fixed periods. In effect, he says that we should refrain from obtaining knowledge upon that point except at certain dates, and yet we know that the same means of knowledge are available every quarter in the Statisticians' returns. This Bill declares that the number of the representatives of the different States shall change in proportion to the population, but that we shall refrain from ascertaining what changes have taken place in that population except at fixed dates. That is so necessary a working rule that I do not intend to quarrel with it, although I still entertain doubts as to whether it is constitutional. If we deliberately refrain from knowledge, except at the five or ten-year periods, we are omitting to add up when changes have taken place so as to ascertain the nature of those changes. I now come to the question of what is the meaning of the words "whenever necessary." The honorable and learned member for Angas said, in effect, that they are meaningless—that they mean that the number of members in this House shall be determined whenever it is necessary to determine them.

Mr. GLYNN.—They mean that whenever we know that a thing is so, we must take steps to find out that it is so.

Mr. McCAY.—If that is the interpretation of the words, certainly they are meaningless. But I have always understood that the Courts do not construe an Act of Parliament so as to render it meaningless, if they can avoid doing so. With every respect, I submit that those words mean that the number of members shall be determined whenever the changes in our population alter the proportion so as to make it necessary to effect an alteration. I think that the words "whenever necessary" refer to the change in population which will cause a change in representation, if the arithmetical ratio is to be preserved. But the words "until the Parliament otherwise provides" precede the words "be determined whenever necessary." To my mind the words "until the Parliament otherwise provides" govern the method of determination to be provided, either with or without the words "whenever necessary." Consequently, Parliament can substitute for the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, figures ascertained in any manner that it may prescribe. That, however, does not get rid of the obligation on the part of the Parliament to alter the number of members as the number of the population alters, because the power of Parliament is limited to a certain arithmetical calculation. I claim that the words "the number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people" are imperative, and are subject to no parliamentary alteration whatever. Parliament cannot declare by legislation that it is not necessary to alter the number of members, when it is necessary under the earlier words of the section. However, I have raised the point; the difficulty is here, and has to be met. I do not see the necessity for providing for a five years' enumeration. I think that an enumeration every ten years would be sufficient. I repeat that the words "until the Parliament otherwise provides" control sub-clauses 1 and 2, and therefore the words "the latest statistics of the Commonwealth." I think that the figures to which reference has been made are statistics in every reasonable sense of the term. Indeed, everything except the allowances for unrecorded arrivals and departures are statistics, and those matters have been tacked on in order to bring the statistics which may be wrong more in accordance with the actual facts. The small extent to which they proved to be wrong upon a previous occasion justifies us in assuming that the results arrived at under the proposals of the Government will be pretty nearly correct.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Because there is only a small difference between the figures and “statistics,” therefore they are statistics.

Mr. McCAY.—No. We are merely accepting something which is nearer to the true facts than is the actual count itself. My doubt all along has been as to the words in the clause which are not controlled by the words, “until the Parliament otherwise provides.” I do not think that our action is likely to be challenged, and if I were arguing the matter before the High Court, I should be strongly tempted to urge that that tribunal must strain the language of the Constitution, because of the extreme inconvenience which would result from a literal interpretation of it.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We ask for no straining at all.

Mr. McCAY.—I fear that this Bill is unconstitutional upon one ground, and I say that in order to defend the measure we have to strain the Constitution. Consequently, I think that the proposal is one which we ought to risk in the interests of the convenience of government.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I fail to see that the objection taken to this Bill by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne is well-founded. It is true that the certificate of the Electoral Officer is to be evidence, but it is only to be evidence of what the enumeration discloses. The Bill prescribes how the enumeration shall be made, and it only makes it evidence for the purposes of revision. I quite agree that what was intended was that there should be a Commonwealth enumeration of the population. In other words, instead of relying upon the statistics of the States by adopting them in an Act of Parliament, it was intended that we should specifically enumerate the population of the Commonwealth for the purpose of ascertaining the representation to which the States were entitled. At the same time, we have the power to adopt the statistics of the States, if we choose to do so. That is what the Government propose to do, and what I conceive is bad policy. I think that we should follow the American example, by having a Commonwealth enumeration, for the purpose of ascertaining the true share of representation to which the various States are entitled. To continue the present method indefinitely is certainly objectionable. That, however, is what the Bill does. A specific enumeration by the Commonwealth would not involve us in any extra expense. We are now asked to pass a Bill dealing with census returns and statistics. We can prescribe in this measure that a census shall be taken for the Commonwealth every ten years. The Bill proposes to adopt the statistics of the States which may or may not be correct, instead of relying upon the enumeration which, according to the spirit of the Constitution, we ought to make. Section 24 of the Constitution is undoubtedly very loosely drafted. Under it we could, if we so chose, abolish the quota system. That system was simply an experiment. It was Mr. Justice O'Connor who was responsible for the suggestion. He pressed it on the Convention, and pointed out that under the words, “until the Parliament otherwise provides,” if it were found that the quota system did not work well, it could be abolished. Hence, after declaring that the basis of representation should be the population, we made provision for varying the method of ascertaining the number of members that should represent each State. We provided that each State should have representation on the basis of its population, but how were we to ascertain when that representation was to be varied? It was because of this difficulty that it was provided that the Parliament might abolish the quota system, and that, further, we might declare that the statistics to be relied upon should not be the latest statistics of the Commonwealth. At present the prescription is that the latest statistics of the Commonwealth must be taken. There is nothing, however, to prevent us from declaring that those adopted for this purpose shall not be the latest. We might declare that the earlier statistics of the Commonwealth were those which truly defined the basis of representation. That would be an absurd position to take up, but it would be open to us under the section as it stands. I therefore consider that, although it would be better, if we could afford it, to take a particular enumeration of the people for the purposes of the first distribution, it will be quite competent for us to declare that the statistics already collected by the States are sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and several other honorable members desire to challenge the principle as to the taking of an enumeration during the period intervening between the census which is prescribed in the Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Prime Minister promised that the division on this clause should be taken as a test.

Mr. GROOM.—It is to be taken as a test as to the principle of departing from the census. That is the only issue.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I had a conversation with the Prime Minister, who was good enough to say that the most convenient method to decide the question whether the Committee regarded the estimates of the Statisticians as being the "latest statistics" within the meaning of the Constitution would be by dividing on clause 2. I admit that if the clause were struck out it would be inconvenient so far as the machinery of the Bill is concerned, but it is obvious that it will be carried. There are several honorable members, however, who wish to show emphatically that they disapprove of the Government proposal, and it is our desire that the division upon clause 2 should be taken as a test.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—Am I to understand that the object of dividing on this clause is to settle the question whether we are to have a redistribution of seats only once in ten years?

Mr. KENNEDY.—No.

Mr. LONSDALE.—At present the census is taken every ten years, and the point that I wish to ascertain is, whether the rejection of this clause would render it impossible to have an intermediate enumeration, so as to enable a redistribution of seats to take place every five years? It appears to me that the object which the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has in view is to bring about a re-adjustment only once in ten years. I am opposed to that proposal, and will vote against any amendment of the Bill in that direction. It seems to me that the Constitution should be strictly adhered to, and that every State should receive its true measure of representation, according to the latest statistics. We have a shifting population, and we should be careful to see that each State, as its population increases, or decreases, has its proper representation in this House. We certainly ought not to seek to prevent that by determining that there shall be only a decennial redistribution. If any change of population can be approximately ascertained every five years, as proposed by this Bill, there ought certainly to be a quinquennial redistribution. In my opinion the intention of the Constitution is that the people of the several States shall have their proper representation in this House, and that any movement of population shall be taken into account. I shall therefore oppose the amendment.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—I should like to know whether the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne proposes that the first enumeration shall be by way of a census, or that there shall not be a redistribution of seats before the next decennial census is taken?

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—The position may be briefly stated. If there be a redistribution under present conditions it must be on the basis of the census of 1901, inasmuch as no statistics have been collected since then. If, however, a census were taken, say, in 1906, the redistribution which followed would be upon the basis of that census.

Mr. SKENE.—Would that be in accordance with the Constitution?

Mr. HIGGINS.—So far as I can see it would.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—The proposal means either that a redistribution of seats shall not take place until 1911, or that a census shall be taken in 1906, at a cost of about £120,000 to the Commonwealth, in order to ascertain what we practically know already.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is a question, not of expediency, but of constitutional right.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — I have listened to the legal arguments, but have not gathered from them what is really the constitutional principle involved.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We could hardly expect the honorable member to oppose his own Bill.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—This is not my own Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But it embodies the honorable member's scheme.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — I may reply to the honorable member by saying he takes up his position now because it is that which he assumed in public some months ago.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I was not then a responsible Minister.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — I hope that the honorable and learned member would not have expressed a different opinion had he been in office; but that he recognised his full responsibility as a member of this Parliament for the course which he then advocated. Another of his proposals is to act upon the census of 1901.

Mr. HIGGINS.—On that alone?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The proposal that we should effect a re-adjustment by reverting to the census of 1901 is an extraordinary one. There has been no redistribution since the passing of a very important measure by which the number of persons exercising the Commonwealth franchise was increased by 100 per cent., and it is surely time, therefore, that one took place. In making the redistribution we ought to ascertain what should be the representation of each State, so that we may start with a basis of State equality, and also endeavour to establish by it the basis of electoral equality.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That may be very expedient, but what of it?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member says that it is not constitutional, but other members of the legal profession, who are quite as capable of expressing an opinion on the subject, differ entirely from him. I do not accept his interpretation of the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I do not ask the honorable member to accept it.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — In the opinion of myself and others more capable than I am of determining the legal aspect of the question, the honorable and learned member has not shown that it would be unconstitutional to adopt the course objected to by him. The honorable and learned member has not convinced me.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I have not tried to.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I may have to admit that I am very dense, but I understood the honorable and learned member to argue that it is unconstitutional to take anything but a census.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I did not say so.

Mr. McCAY.—He said an actual count.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—What is an actual count but a census? The honorable and learned member for Corinella spoke by way of illustration of tallying the persons leaving or entering a room. Would the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne accept such a tally in connexion with a count of the people as a census? To go back to the census of 1901 would be to abandon the whole position, by going back five years to make an adjustment meant to meet our present conditions, whereas, if we wait for the census of 1911, we shall have to continue to take no recognition of the passing of the Women's Franchise Act, and either not redistribute, or, if we redistribute, take no notice of the relative representation of the States. The other proposal is to take a census in 1906. I have already pointed out the enormous expense that that would entail. We should spend £120,000 to arrive at figures which would almost beyond question be practically the same as those which we at present possess—a course which I do not think the people of Australia would like to see taken.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne apparently wants to go back to the census of 1901, so that Victoria may continue to have a representation of twenty-three members, to which she is not entitled. You, Mr. Chairman, have to-night witnessed a great display of legal gymnastics, in the endeavour of honorable gentlemen to prove that statistics are not statistics, and similar difficult propositions. With regard to the proposal to take a census next year, I indorse what the honorable member for North Sydney has said about the expense, but I would further point out that if it were taken in December, Parliament would then have expired by effluxion of time, and on the results being presented after the general election, it would be contended by the honorable member for Northern Melbourne and others that we could not agree to a redistribution of seats then, because if we did so we should have to hold another general election on the new basis, and the Commonwealth could not afford the expense. The position would be pretty much the same if the census were taken in June next. We know that in connexion with the taking of a State census it is generally four or five months before the returns have all been got in, made up, and checked, and we could not expect to learn the result of the Commonwealth census until the end of the year. The proposal that we shall wait for the census of 1911 makes it evident that the honorable member for Northern Melbourne is not actuated by the Federal spirit in this matter. The Minister of Home Affairs is one of the representatives of Queensland, and he, no doubt, recognises that what applies to New South Wales to-day will probably apply to Queensland two or three years hence, and is showing a good deal of sagacity in pushing the Bill through. As the right honorable member for Swan has pointed out, if the Committee agreed to the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, the Bill would practically have to be dropped, and the redistribution of seats postponed. There will always be difficulties in the way of the redistribution of seats so long as the matter is left to Parliament to deal with. Technical and legal objections, such as those which have been put forward by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, will always be raised. Each time we come to consider the question, a fresh hurdle is erected, and the House baulks at it as a matter of course. I may be accused of being actuated only by a desire to further the interests of my own constituents, but I would point out that New South Wales has a population which demands this larger representation. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne was forced to use very weak arguments in objecting to the proposal that the figures of the States Statisticians shall be accepted. He appeared to think that persons might cross the border-line between New South Wales and Victoria in vehicles, and thus escape the lynx-eyed Customs officials. He might as well object that no provision is made for counting those who may come over in balloons. In all matters affecting finance and trade, the figures of the States Statisticians are willingly accepted without cavil. It is only in this matter that they are objected to.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And then by the representatives of one State only.

Mr. WILKS.—Yes. The State of Western Australia has at present a representation of five members by virtue of a special concession made by the Constitution, but the time is arriving when she will be entitled to five, and perhaps more members, on a population basis. When that time arrives, the difficulties of re-adjustment will be accentuated. I trust that the Committee will not listen to the un-Federal arguments of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne. As he has not thought it worth his while to move an amendment, he must be regarded as merely desirous of erecting a placard for the advertisement of a certain State, and certainly lays himself open to the charge of wasting time. Seeing that the greatest relative loser of population among the States is Tasmania, the honorable member for Bass, and the other representatives of that State, should be the first to assist the members from other States in securing just representation, and I trust that he will not vote against the clause.

Question—that the clause be agreed to—put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3—

1. The day on which any census of the people of the Commonwealth is taken shall be an Enumeration Day within the meaning of this Act.
2. The Chief Electoral Officer shall appoint other Enumeration Days as follows:—

- (a) The first Enumeration Day shall be appointed as soon as practicable after the commencement of this Act;
- (b) Thereafter an Enumeration Day shall be appointed at the expiration of every fifth year after the taking of the then last preceding census.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—Many honorable members who voted in favour of the preceding clause will, I am sure, be averse to the adoption of a system that will entail a redistribution of the whole of the electorates of the Commonwealth every five years. Any such arrangement would be attended with the greatest inconvenience. Although we may agree as to the necessity for some statutory provision relating to the statistics which are to be adopted as the basis for determining the representation of the various States, it should not be necessary to disturb the whole of the electoral divisions every five years. It is already difficult enough for the electors to accustom themselves to the electoral boundaries, and if changes are made in the manner contemplated, some honorable members will be called upon to devote their attention to an entirely new set of electors every few years. The United States Act makes provision for a redistribution after each decennial census, and a similar provision is contained in the Canadian Statute.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—This clause does not refer to the redistribution of seats, but to the readjustment of the States representation.

Mr. CROUCH.—But the readjustment referred to will almost necessarily involve a redistribution of seats, at least in the States whose representation is either increased or decreased.

Mr. TUDOR.—If the constituencies are kept near the quota there will be no necessity for a redistribution of seats every five years.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am very sorry to say that, up to date, the number of electors in the metropolitan constituencies have been kept as high as they can be, whereas the number of voters in country electorates have been kept as low as they can be.

Mr. TUDOR.—That was a mistake.

Mr. CROUCH.—Until the honorable member can assure me with authority that the contrary will be the case I must presume that that system will be continued. I move—

That the word "an," line 2, be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "the."

Subsequently, I shall move that sub-clause 2 be omitted.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If sub-clause 2 be struck out the whole Bill will go by the board.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I understand that the honorable and learned member for Corio imagines that the wording of this clause renders it imperative that there shall be a redistribution of seats every five years. I do not agree with him. I take it that the meaning of the sub-clause is that the five-year period will be calculated from the taking of the next census. Under the Bill, an enumeration will be made five years after the next census is taken. Hence the objection of the honorable and learned member falls entirely to the ground.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I do not think that the honorable and learned member for Corio should attempt to accomplish his object by the amendment which he has submitted. We ought to have some means of immediately ascertaining the population of the Commonwealth. I would suggest that he should amend paragraph b by omitting the word "fifth," line 11, with a view to insert the word "tenth" in lieu thereof. Then the first enumeration would take place as soon as was convenient after the passing of the Act, and subsequent enumerations at the expiration of every tenth year after the taking of the last preceding census. At the present time, it rests with the Government to determine when the census shall be taken. I understand that they suggest that it should be taken every ten years.

Mr. GROOM.—The provision has been left in its present form to enable us to co-operate with the States.

Mr. GLYNN.—If we provide for an enumeration every ten years we ought to see that a census is taken every ten years, and not leave it to an Executive act. We can make the enumeration fall upon the census day, after the first enumeration has taken place. By so doing, we should certainly comply with the spirit of the Constitution, which is that there ought to be a particular enumeration for Commonwealth purposes, and that we ought not to deal with this matter upon mere estimates. Otherwise we shall have to trust to the accuracy of the States statistics, and it was never contemplated that those statistics should be used for the purposes of the Commonwealth.

Mr. MAHON.—Does the honorable and learned member think that it is possible that the States would present inaccurate statistics for the purpose of getting a larger representation?

Mr. GLYNN.—All things are possible. I do not think that what I have suggested is likely to happen, but still all these things must be contemplated. The framers of our Constitution did not think it wise to leave to the States matters of this sort, in which self-interest may be very strong. If the honorable and learned member for Corio will withdraw his amendment so as not to prevent a special enumeration being made, subject to the allowances prescribed in the schedule for the first redistribution, I shall support him.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—It seems to me that there is a good deal of make-believe in regard to this Bill. So far I have been unable to ascertain when the measure will commence to operate. The Minister of Home Affairs made some remarks about an enumeration taking place in 1906—that is, five years from the time of the compilation of the last census in 1901. If an enumeration be made in 1906, and a redistribution of seats has to follow, what will be the result? Past experience teaches that we shall not be able to get a redistribution scheme prepared and passed by this House in time for the election which will take place at the end of next year. Consequently I should like to know whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the redistribution scheme framed by the various officers of the States within the past few months, or whether we are to have an entirely fresh redistribution.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—I can assure the honorable member for Herbert that this Bill is not intended to be a sham, but a serious piece of legislation to be acted upon. It distinctly provides that immediately after the passing of the Act an enumeration day shall be fixed. The Ministry hope that the Bill will be passed by this Parliament very soon. If the measure becomes law this month, an enumeration day will be appointed in October. Upon that enumeration day being fixed the Chief Electoral Officer will ascertain from the Statisticians the population of the respective States. According to past experience, it takes two or three months to obtain that information. When it has been furnished, a certificate will be issued, and the Government will then order a redistribution of seats. They will appoint the same officers to make the redistribution, so as to comply with the provisions of the Electoral Act, and in order that their reports may be laid on the table of the House at the earliest possible date. Parliament will then be able to adopt them, so as to bring the redistribution scheme into operation for the next general election.

Mr. BAMFORD.—There will be no time to do that.

Mr. GROOM.—I can assure the honorable member that, administratively, I have had the matter worked out by the officers of the Department. There will be ample time to have the whole scheme brought into operation, so that the next general election may take place in accordance with the provisions of this Bill, and so that the quotas will comply with the provisions of the Electoral Act itself. That is the intention of the Government, and that is why we are endeavouring to get this measure passed at the earliest possible moment. The honorable and learned member for Corio has expressed a fear that because we have made provision for an enumeration every fifth year, there will of necessity be a redistribution of seats in all the States every five years. That is not so.

Mr. MAHON.—But there must be a count of all the people every five years.

Mr. GROOM.—There must be a count every five years in order to ascertain what are the rights of the States. For example, if a count were taken in the year 1916, five years after that of 1911, Western Australia—if she continues to progress as she has been doing—would probably be entitled to an additional representative. The honorable and learned member for Corio need entertain no fear that there will be a redistribution of seats every five years. It will only be necessary to redistribute seats in the particular States which happen to be affected. Let us suppose that Victoria's proportion is not affected; in that case there will not necessarily be a redistribution in Victoria. If Western Australia or Queensland were entitled to an additional member there would of necessity have to be a redistribution, or if a representative were taken away from a State a redistribution would also be necessary. These are the points raised by the honorable and learned member for Corio, and I ask him not to press his amendment, inasmuch as in substance the question was decided on a previous division.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—The honorable and learned member for Angas, who said that we should not deal with mere estimates, has supported my contention in a way that I did not anticipate. I would point out that there is another reason in addition to that which I have mentioned to him why I do not wish to accept the amendment which he suggested, and that is that in my opinion "enumeration day" and "census day" should be synonymous terms. The question of the constitutionality of the Government proposal has been dealt with, but we have yet to say whether it is wise for us to act upon mere estimates of the population in determining the measure of representation which each State should enjoy in this House. I have before me a statement made by Senator Styles that—

I was talking only the other day to Mr. McLean, the Victorian Statistician, who said that although he had supplied statistics, they were not sufficiently reliable for the representation of any State to be altered upon their basis.

Mr. MCCAY.—Mr. McLean, in an official letter to the late Treasurer in March last, said that no allowance for error could entitle Victoria to twenty-three members.

Mr. CROUCH.—The statement in question was made by Senator Styles as recently as the 7th July last. I hold that if any reduction is to be made in the representation of a State in this House, it should be based upon thoroughly reliable statistics, and not upon mere estimates of population. To make a redistribution on the estimates of the Statisticians would be to depart entirely from the course proposed some time ago by certain very prominent members of the House. Senator Styles went on to say on the occasion in question that "Mr. Coghlan also thinks it is a good and sound principle," that no alteration should be made until a census has taken place. The representation of the States in this Chamber was originally determined, not upon the census, but upon the estimates of the Statisticians, and when nine months later the census returns were published it was found that the population of New South Wales was 2,000 below the estimate, while that of Victoria was from 36,000 to 38,000 in excess of the figures supplied by the Statisticians.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — The census figures left the representation just as before.

Mr. CROUCH.—If the honorable member refers to Coghlan he will find that my statement is correct.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — I have the figures.

Mr. CROUCH.—There can be no doubt that the census of 1901 showed that the estimates made nine months before by the Statisticians were grievously wrong. In view of this fact, and the fact that the Government Statisticians of New South Wales and Victoria have said that they prefer to work on the census rather than on mere estimates, it will be a huge farce for the Committee to pass the Bill as introduced. It would be unfair to reduce the representation of any State on the mere estimates of Statisticians. Even if it was the fault of the Government of the day that action was not taken to alter the representation of New South Wales immediately upon the publication of the census returns for 1901, that is no reason why any honorable member should have his constituency wiped out on estimates that have proved to be inaccurate. We should have reliable information instead of mere misleading estimates to work upon. The Minister has said that the Government do not desire to expend £120,000 on taking a census for this purpose. It is not my wish that that expenditure should be incurred. I should be better pleased if the redistribution were allowed to remain in abeyance until the next decennial census were taken, but I feel that it would be better to have a census taken in 1906—and in that way to secure reliable information—than it would be to make a redistribution of seats on estimates that are not to be relied upon.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4—

1. The numbers of the people shall be ascertained as on Enumeration Day in accordance with the following provisions:—

(b) In the case of an Enumeration Day not being a census day, allowances shall then be made. . . .

2. Until the census is taken pursuant to any law of the Commonwealth, the census taken pursuant to the law of any State shall, as regards that State, be the census for the purposes of this Act.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane) I move—

That the word "allowances," line 5, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "calculations."

Mr. CROUCH.— I think that "guess" would be the proper word to use.

Mr. CULPIN.—It is essentially a matter in which calculations should be made, and I trust that the Committee will agree to the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—The point upon which I wish to lay stress is that an expenditure of £120,000 every five years in ascertaining the number of the population would be altogether unwarranted. We ought to know from the Minister whether this enumeration practically means the taking of a census every five years.

Mr. GLYNN.—It ought to mean that, but it does not mean it in the Bill.

Mr. MAHON.—I put aside all technical and legal complications, and wish to get down to the simple method to be pursued in making this enumeration. What I desire to know is what it will cost; I do not care whether it be called a census or an enumeration.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What did the last enumeration cost?

Mr. MAHON.—I understand that the last enumeration was the last census.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No. The last Government took an enumeration.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The census costs about £120,000 for collection and compilation; but the ascertainment of the population in the manner here prescribed has not hitherto cost the Commonwealth anything, the information being furnished by the States gratuitously.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—I object to the proposed enumeration. It is not only a clumsy and slipshod way of ascertaining the number of the population, but, as the Minister has shown, also a cheap and nasty way. The census is a semi-scientific method of getting at the truth, and provides the only reliable data that we can go on. Both an enumeration and a census will be unnecessary. It seems to me that it will be sufficient to take a census every ten years, and I enter my protest, not only against the taking of a quinquennial census, but also against the taking of an enumeration, which is merely a vague guessing, whereby it is impossible to do justice.

Amendment (by Mr. GROOM) proposed—

That after the word "taken," line 8, the words "after the commencement of this Act" be inserted.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I wish to inform the honorable member for North Sydney, who has the support of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who said that he had a letter from the Government Statist of Victoria, in which it was stated that there was no difference of any sort between Mr. Coghlan's estimate—

Mr. MCCAY.—I did not say anything of the kind. I said that there was a letter from the Victorian Government Statist—if the honorable and learned member will allow me to explain?

Mr. CROUCH.—I do not know that I will just now. My recollection of what the honorable and learned member said is that he had a letter from the Government Statist of Victoria, in which it was stated that there was no difference between the census returns and the estimate upon which the representation of this House was framed. Will the honorable and learned member withdraw that statement?

Mr. MCCAY.—I will not withdraw what I did not say.

Mr. CROUCH.—When I was speaking the honorable member for North Sydney left the Chamber, and was going to get Coghlan's book.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—No, I was not.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable member was going to show that the figures on which the representation of this House was first based were similar to the returns of the census of 1901.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I did not say anything of the sort. I said that the representation was not affected by the difference.

Mr. CROUCH.—I will show the Committee what the difference was. Coghlan, at page 250 of his issue of the Seven Colonies for 1899-1900, estimates the population of New South Wales at 1,356,650, and the population of Victoria at 1,163,400—a difference in favour of New South Wales of 193,250. In the issue for 1901-2, however, at page 531, Coghlan states the result of the census of 1901 as New South Wales 1,354,846, and Victoria 1,201,070—a difference of 153,776 in favour of New South Wales, so that in two years New South Wales had lost 1,804 people, while Victoria had gained 37,670. Mr. Coghlan on a later page acknowledges that he had made a mistake. For us to base the representation of the Commonwealth on such estimates is unfair to all the States, and the Bill itself recognises that the figures furnished by the Statisticians are inaccurate, because it provides for the adding of 9 per cent., 12 per cent., and so on. In December, 1903, there were 612,472 names on the Victorian electoral rolls; but a statement of the results of a recent canvass, published by the Department of Home Affairs while the honorable member for North Sydney was Minister, showed an increase in the number of Victorian voters of 5,542. In December, 1903, the number of names on the New South Wales rolls was 687,049, and the same statement showed the real number of electors to be 669,500—a decrease of 17,549. Yet almost immediately afterwards the Reid-McLean Government were ready to proclaim certain figures, which would have caused Victoria to lose a member. At the time when, according to the Statisticians, New South Wales was gaining population, that State really lost nearly 2,000 persons, while Victoria gained 37,670; yet the Reid-McLean Administration proposed to make a proclamation as to the respective numbers of the States without coming to this House at all.

Mr. McCAY.—We should have had to come to Parliament.

Mr. CROUCH.—They wanted to do it by Executive act, and not by a Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—To do what by Executive act?

Mr. CROUCH.—To proclaim the statistics of the population of the two States without coming to Parliament.

Mr. McCAY.—We should have had to come to Parliament with any proposed redistribution.

Mr. CROUCH.—I did not say that they would not. What I said was that the dispute about the figures was going to be settled by them by proclamation and an Executive act, instead of the matter being brought before Parliament. At the time that the Reid-McLean Administration were ready to do this, the adult electors of Victoria, male and female, had increased by 5,542, while those of New South Wales had decreased by 17,549. I did not wish to refer to this matter, but the statements of honorable members have made it necessary for me to support with details my original assertions. It would be very dangerous indeed to rely on the estimates of the Statisticians. Personally I have sufficient confidence in the people of the other States to be prepared to trust Victoria to their government, but as the Constitution provides for the representation of the States, I shall not permit this State to be deprived of its fair representation by any system based on what is proved to be stupid guesswork. With regard to the proposal to redistribute the constituencies every five years, it seems to me that it will cause great inconvenience. In one instance it is proposed to make up a constituency of parts of four of the present constituencies. I think that it is unfair that the constituencies should be cut up every five years.

Instead of preserving community of interests, such as the Electoral Act contemplated, we shall throw the constituencies into a state of confusion at very short intervals, and I believe that honorable members will have cause to regret the course they have adopted to-night.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I desire to correct a misapprehension under which the honorable and learned member for Corio appears to be labouring with regard to an interjection I made whilst he was speaking. I interjected that the Government Statistician of Victoria stated, in writing, in March of this year, to the Treasurer of the Commonwealth, in reference to the estimates published on the 31st December, 1904, "I do not think that any error which may have occurred will entitle Victoria to twenty-three members."

Mr. CROUCH.—We shall see what Hansard records as having been stated by the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not care what the honorable and learned member thinks, but I wish to make matters quite plain to the members of the Committee.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I see that in schedule A, provision is made for certain percentages of allowance for unrecorded arrivals and departures by sea and land. It is stated that—

In the case of the States of New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, and South Australia, 10 per centum shall be added to the numbers of people arriving and departing as shown by the information received from the Railway Departments, to allow for unrecorded arrivals and departures by rail and road.

I should like to know how that allowance of 10 per cent. has been arrived at. Then I notice that in paragraph 5 certain percentages are to be added to the numbers of persons departing by sea to allow for unrecorded departures. In New South Wales and Victoria 9 per cent., in Queensland 10 per cent., in South Australia 7 per cent., in Western Australia 5 per cent., and in Tasmania 12½ per cent. is to be allowed. It appears to me that the variation in the percentages requires some explanation. The figures for Tasmania are so very exact that I presume they must have been based upon reliable information. At the same time, it occurs to me that a larger percentage might very well be allowed in the case of Western Australia, because, although the principal traffic passes through three or four ports, a considerable number of persons arrive and depart from the north-western ports of that State. For instance, a large number of pearlers come and go from Broome, on the north-western coast, and depart thence, but I presume that the majority of those would be coloured aliens, who would not be included in the count for the purpose of determining the representation of the State. Still there are many others who arrive at or depart from Wyndham, Broome, Derby, and other places. Moreover, a number of persons use Esperance as a point of arrival and departure. I should like to have some explanation from the Minister.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I am not quite sure that I understand the full effect of the amendment proposed by the Minister. It appears to me that if the words "after the commencement of this Act" are inserted after the word "taken," as he proposes, they will have the effect of postponing the second enumeration day until five years after the next census is taken. That would be five years after 1911. Under clause 3 I understand that there is to be an enumeration every census day, and that there is to be a special enumeration day midway between the census days. All I desire to know is whether it is the intention of the Minister to fix the second enumeration day five years after the next census is taken.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—With respect to the question asked by the honorable member for Coolgardie, I may explain that the percentages were supplied by the States Statisticians, who met in conference. After deliberation and consultation, and after the revision of all their figures for the three years following the census taken in 1901, they worked out the percentages embodied in the Bill. They regarded 10 per cent. as a fair allowance to make for unrecorded arrivals and departures by land. So far as arrivals and departures by sea are concerned, the Statisticians worked out the records of the departments, and then made a comparison with the census statements with a view to arrive at an absolutely reliable percentage. Western Australia is to a certain extent like an island, and the returns of population generally can, therefore, be compiled with a fair degree of accuracy. The same remarks apply to Tasmania, and it is only in the eastern States that any difficulty arises. With regard to the remarks of the honorable and learned member for Angas, I would point out that clause 3 provides that the day on which any census of the people of the Commonwealth is taken shall be an enumeration day. That is a fixed day. The intention of the clause is to enable us to fix an enumeration day as early as possible after the passing of the Bill. The next enumeration day would be a census day, and after that, assuming that a decennial census is taken regularly, we should at alternating periods have census and enumeration days, which are not census days.

Mr. GLYNN.—I know that that is what is intended; but I am afraid that the amendment proposed by the Minister will not have the desired effect.

Mr. GROOM.—I shall consult the Parliamentary Draftsman, and take care that the intention is clearly expressed.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—Although the Committee has decided by an overwhelming majority to accept the enumeration days as involving a possible readjustment of the representation of the States, I still adhere to the belief that it would have been far better to fix census periods for effecting a change of representation. Under existing circumstances, I feel that we must agree to an enumeration being made every fifth year, and to the census returns being collected every tenth year. In order that the information thus derived may be as accurate as possible, it seems to me that a special arrangement will require to be made with the States under which the enumeration shall be conducted upon definite lines. It should be specifically set out in the Bill that no change shall be made in the boundaries of electorates unless there is a sufficient alteration in the number of voters to justify a change in the representation of the various States. My object is to avoid expense. If we make these changes every ten years, in my judgment, we shall accomplish all that is necessary. Although I voted in favour of obtaining accurate information, I cannot persist in objections to the recommendations of the Government.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—The honorable and learned member for Corio spoke of the reduction in the population of New South Wales, with a view to showing that no enumeration should be made apart from the actual taking of the census. But I would point out to him that the reduction in the voting strength of the electorates there is due to the fact that it is very much more difficult to collect statistics in New South Wales than it is in Victoria. In the latter State the population is very much denser. The people in New South Wales are scattered over a much larger area, and consequently it is more difficult to secure an accurate enumeration there. Concerning the question of the percentages to be added to the numbers of persons departing by sea, to allow for unrecorded departures by sea, I take it that the State Statisticians, in conference assembled, found that they had not previously made a fair allowance, and consequently agreed to the percentages which have been embodied in this Bill. In so acting their object was to get as accurate an enumeration as possible. In the case of Western Australia, it seems to me that the allowance of 5 per cent. is rather an advantage than otherwise to that State. I think it is proper that we should make an enumeration of the population, especially if the work can be undertaken without incurring any very great expenditure.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6—(Certificate of Chief Electoral Officer).

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I presume that the regulations mentioned in this provision will be laid upon the table of the House?

Mr. GROOM.—Yes.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The adoption of that course will involve delay.

Mr. GROOM.—No; not in bringing the Act into operation. I can give the honorable member my assurance on that point.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 9 agreed to.

Clause 10—

When in pursuance of a certificate under this Act an alteration takes place in the number of members of the House of Representatives to be chosen in any State the alteration shall not take effect—

- (a) at any election held before the State has been redistributed into electoral divisions pursuant to the certificate; nor
- (b) at any election to fill a vacancy in a House of Representatives elected before such redistribution.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I am somewhat doubtful as to whether we have power to pass this clause. It provides that after we have ascertained what the number of members ought to be for each State, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, we shall not put the law into force. In other words, when we have determined the number of members to which each State is entitled, we need not apply this Act to any election which takes place immediately afterwards, or any election which has not been preceded by a Redistribution of Seats Act. I quite recognise the difficulty in which the Ministry find themselves, but it seems to me that they are endeavouring to overcome it by adopting an unconstitutional method.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The section is intended to meet two contingencies. The honorable member must see that it may happen that an enumeration is ordered practically within two or three days of the time for a dissolution of Parliament. That being so, it would be utterly impossible by any conceivable electoral machinery to give effect to the alteration. Take the case of a dissolution which may occur during the currency of a Parliament before it is possible to redistribute the electorates so as to enable the elections to be held on the redistributed basis. Again, in the event of a vacancy arising after an alteration of members and before a dissolution, we could not redistribute the whole of the electorates which are represented by members who constitute an existing House.

Mr. GLYNN.—But the Constitution provides that we must do that.

Mr. GROOM.—An alteration can only be effected in the manner provided by the Bill. I submit that it is for Parliament to determine whenever it is necessary to change the proportion. In this Bill we are laying down a definite course of procedure, so that we may know exactly how we are to act.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—I think that this clause requires to be amended if the Bill is to fulfil the intention of the Minister. He has declared that it is desirable that the decision as to when an adjustment of representation shall take place should be taken out of the hands of the Government, and placed by Act of Parliament beyond question. Whilst I see that the Bill contains provision for the method by which an enumeration of the population shall be made, and for the time of making such an enumeration, it seems to me that no provision is made to insure a re-adjustment of representation, apart altogether from the will of the Ministry. That is to say, all these steps may be taken, but nothing may ensue. Consequently, I move—

That the following words be added to paragraph (b)—“but shall take effect at the first general election after such redistribution.”

I do not think that such an amendment would operate in any way against the intention of the Bill. It would make it absolutely clear that the readjustment is not to be left to the will of the Minister; but that after certain steps have been taken under the provisions of this measure, a final step is to follow.

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The Government are prepared to accept the principle of the amendment, and if it be necessary to put it in technical form, it will be open to us to have the provision re-drafted.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—Presuming that an enumeration shows that a redistribution of seats should at once take place, I think that the necessary Bill should be immediately brought in, so that the redistribution may apply to the next general election. I should like to know whether that is the intention.

Mr. GROOM.—I promise the honorable member that I will look into the whole question.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11 (Power to make regulations).

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I have a technical objection to offer to the clause. I think that in the Acts Interpretation Amendment Act, we provide that regulations that have to be laid before Parliament, may be disapproved of by resolution of which notice has been given within the period named, and I fail to see why we should not follow the terminology of that Act in the present case. It is provided in this clause that—

A regulation . . . shall not have any force until it has been laid before both Houses of the Parliament for thirty days, or, if within that time a resolution has been proposed in either House of the Parliament to disapprove of the regulation, until the motion for the resolution has been disposed of.

An honorable member might, within the thirty days, give notice of a motion to disapprove of the regulation, but it might be impossible to deal with it for at least two months. Regulations might be laid on the table in the middle of a session, when the notice-paper was loaded with private members' business, and although a notice of motion was given within the time specified, it might be impossible to discuss it for another two months. I shall not move an amendment, but make the suggestion to the Government that we should adhere to the principle laid down in the Acts Interpretation

Mr. GROOM (Darling Downs—Minister of Home Affairs).—The object of framing the clause as it stands was to insure that Parliament should have complete control over the bases of the enumeration. Under the Rules Publication Act the rules in specific cases, I think, take effect provisionally. I shall, however, look into the drafting of the clause, and if necessary, bring it into line with the Acts Interpretation Act.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY BILL.

In Committee—(Consideration resumed from 23rd August, vide page 1386).

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Exclusive privileges of Postmaster-General).

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I should like to ask the Postmaster-General whether he will consider a very much better way of arriving at the object sought to be achieved by this clause. If he has read the Age of to-day he will know that a man in Victoria—an ordinary laundryman—is able to obtain messages from other parts of the world in an instant of time. I suggest that it would be to the advantage of Australia, as a whole, if the Government could enlist his services. The Minister should look into the matter, and should particularly consult the Prime Minister in reference to it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH (Parkes).—I should like to ask the Postmaster-General whether this is an attempt to monopolize all possible utilization of wireless telegraphy? Has the honorable gentleman made any arrangement with the patentees in regard to its use, or is this simply an appropriation of all patents for use by the State in Australia, without any attempt at arriving at an arrangement with the owners?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro—Postmaster-General).—The Bill is simply designed to give the Postmaster-General all the powers that he should properly exercise in regard to wireless telegraphy. No arrangement has been made with any particular patentee.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—This is simply a Bill to appropriate the patent?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Not to appropriate it.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is designed to enable the Commonwealth, not to appropriate the invention, but to control it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That is all I wished to know.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—In moving

That the House do now adjourn,

I desire to intimate that we shall proceed to-morrow with the consideration of the Commerce Bill, and I hope that our deliberations will be marked by the same spirit of industry and application that has characterized our efforts to-night.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Senate.

Thursday, 14 September, 1905.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers:—

Return to order of the Senate of 30th August, 1905. Tarcoola Post Office: Annual telegraphic revenue.

Provisional Regulations under the Defence Acts 1903-1904.—Statutory Rules 1905, No. 54.

SUGAR INDUSTRY: ABORIGINES.

Senator WALKER asked the Minister representing the Minister of Trade and Customs, upon notice—

1. Is it a fact, as reported, that where aborigines of Australia are employed in the sugar industry, persons so employing them are ineligible to obtain the rebate which is supposed to be given to others only employing white labour?

2. If the answer is in the affirmative to the previous question, is it the intention of the Government to remove such restriction, the aborigines being the original owners of the soil of this country?

3. Are Australian half-castes, quadroons, and octoroons reckoned as aborigines when employed in the sugar industry?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. The employment of aborigines in the production of sugar-cane operates as a bar to the payment of bounty on any such cane.

2. The matter will receive consideration.

3. The Sugar Regulations state that "the expression 'white labour' is used to the exclusion of all forms of coloured labour, whether aborigines of Australia or not, and whether half-caste or of full blood."

MR. O. C. BEALE.

Senator MATHESON asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. Has his attention been called to a reported speech of Mr. O. C. Beale, in the Age of 11th September, 1905, as follows:—

"A syndicate in London was prepared to spend £700,000 in constructing a tunnel under the harbor to North Sydney—(a voice: 'No good!')—Never mind if it was any good or not, why in the wide world should they not let a syndicate spend £700,000 in the country if it wanted to?"

2. Is the speaker the same Mr. Beale whom the Prime Minister has accredited by letter to several European countries to inquire into certain subjects on behalf of the Commonwealth?

3. Do the Government consider that Mr. Beale's opinion, as expressed above, represents a correct standard of commercial morality?

4. Do the Government consider that Mr. Beale's opinion, as expressed above and emanating from a representative of Australia on his way to Europe, is likely to improve the credit of the Commonwealth?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The answers to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. The newspaper report has been read.

2. Yes.

3 and 4. Ministers entertain no doubt of Mr. Beale's commercial standard, or of his fitness to uphold the credit of the Commonwealth.

Senator MATHESON.—I should like point out that that is not a reply to my question.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator can ask another question, but he cannot debate the reply to his question.

Senator MATHESON.—I asked whether Mr. Beale's opinion represented a correct standard of commercial morality, and not whether Mr. Beale was commercially moral. I should like to have an answer to the question.

Senator KEATING.—That raises the whole question of what is moral and immoral again.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Motion (by Senator WALKER) agreed to—

That two months' leave of absence be granted to Senator Lt.-Col. the Honorable John Cash Neild, on account of his serious illness.

RE-ARRANGEMENT OF BUSINESS.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—On behalf, and at the request of Senator Neild, I desire to postpone, until 9th November, the first notice of motion standing in his name, and relating to the sittings of the High Court.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator can postpone the notice of motion; he does not need to ask leave.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—With some diffidence, sir, I rise to draw your attention to the fact that a measure dealing with this matter is likely to come before the Senate. May I suggest to Senator Walker that he should postpone the notice of motion until next week, with a view to consulting Senator Neild, and asking his permission, either to move the motion on his behalf, or to allow it to drop off the notice-paper. Otherwise the Senate may be hampered at a later stage if the question is sought to be discussed in his absence.

The PRESIDENT.—I think we shall have to make an alteration in our Standing Orders in reference to this matter. Under the Standing Orders of the House of Commons no honorable member can give notice of a motion for more than four sitting days ahead, but our Standing Orders contain no such limitation, and an honorable senator can give notice of a motion for a date months ahead. That precludes the Senate from discussing the question, because to do so would be to anticipate the discussion on the motion. It is a state of affairs which, I think, ought not to continue, and I intend to ask the Standing Orders Committee to consider it. It is not right that one member of the Senate should be able to put a motion on the notice-paper, and thus prevent any discussion of its subject-matter. Under the present Standing Orders, however, Senator Walker has merely to state that at the request of Senator Neild, he postpones this notice of motion to a certain date.

Senator WALKER.—Am I at liberty, sir, to withdraw the notice of motion on behalf of Senator Neild? He merely asked me to postpone the notice of motion until the 9th November.

The PRESIDENT.—I shall give the honorable senator an opportunity of re-stating what he wishes to do.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I really do not know what to do. I am sure that Senator Neild has no wish to interfere with the privileges of the Senate in regard to the subject-matter of the four notices of motion standing in his name on the notice-paper to-day.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator can say that on behalf of Senator Neild he is not going to move the first notice of motion, or he can put it down for a future date.

Senator WALKER.—I am sure that Senator Neild does not wish to interfere with the transaction of any business here.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator can allow the notice of motion to drop off the notice-paper, and fresh notice may be given if desired.

Senator WALKER.—I shall do that, sir.

Senator MILLEN.—I suppose it is quite understood by you, sir, and Senator Walker, that I in no sense suggested that Senator Neild put this motion on the notice-paper with a view to prevent the discussion of its subject-matter. I regret that ill-health is the cause of his absence.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia).—The Senate is indebted to you, sir, for the intimation you have given in regard to a position which might be embarrassing in relation to public business. We are also indebted to your efforts on a previous occasion in making the rule so elastic as to enable the transaction of public business to be facilitated. I think it is our duty to recognise that fact.

Senator PEARCE.—There are three other notices of motion in the name of Senator Neild, sir.

The PRESIDENT.—The time has not yet arrived for those notices of motion to be called on.

Senator PEARCE.—But this is the time set apart for private business.

The PRESIDENT.—Under the Standing Orders honorable senators have a right at this stage to re-arrange the dates on which they will move their notices of motion. I asked if any honorable senator wished to re-arrange his business, and Senator Walker said that on behalf and at the request of Senator Neild he wished to put down the first notice of motion for a future date.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Then he intimated that he will not move the notice of motion.

The PRESIDENT.—Yes. Not one of the other three notices of motion in the name of Senator Neild has yet been called on.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—Senator Neild also wishes to have notice of motion No. 2, standing in his name, postponed.

The PRESIDENT. — The honorable senator must state the date to which he wishes to have the notice of motion postponed.

Senator WALKER.—I wish to have it postponed until 9th November, but I hope that I am at liberty to say that if it would be more convenient that the notice of motion should drop off the paper, I do not wish to inconvenience the Senate.

The PRESIDENT.—Do I understand that Senator Neild wishes to have the notice of motion postponed until 9th November?

Senator WALKER.—Yes.

The PRESIDENT. — Then that is finished; the notice of motion is postponed. Notice of motion No. 3 also stands in the name of Senator Neild. What is to be done with that? Honorable senators will, I think, see the position. A notice of motion on the paper is the property of the mover, and no one else can move it, except at his request, and on his behalf. If it is called on and is not moved, either by the honorable senator who has put it on the paper or by some one on his behalf, it falls off the paper. But the Senate cannot insist on discussing it, because it cannot be moved except by the senator who has given notice. Does Senator Walker, on behalf of Senator Neild, ask that notice of motion No. 3 shall be postponed until 9th November?

Senator WALKER.—Yes.

The PRESIDENT.—Then it is postponed.

Senator WALKER.—On Senator Neild's behalf, I wish to move notice of motion No. 4.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—And at his request?

Senator WALKER.—No.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator cannot move it except at Senator Neild's request.

Senator WALKER. — Senator Neild asked me to get all his notices of motion postponed. He sent his son to my house, he himself being very ill.

NATIONAL MONOPOLY IN TOBACCO: SELECT COMMITTEE.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I move—

That the evidence taken before the Select Committee of the Senate last session on the subject of the Tobacco Industry, and laid upon the Table of the Senate 4th August ultimo, be referred to the Select Committee on Tobacco Monopoly appointed on 31st August, with leave to report it.

I thought that this motion would have been accepted as formal. The evidence taken by the Committee appointed last session has been laid upon the table of the Senate, and my desire is that it shall be referred to the Select Committee which has been re-constituted. I do not know what reasons may animate Senator Millen in desiring to discuss the motion, but I shall have an opportunity to reply, and will avail myself of it. At this stage I simply move the motion.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—Senator Pearce seems to resent very much my action in requiring this motion to be taken as not formal.

Senator PEARCE.—I did not resent it, but I could not understand the honorable senator's action.

Senator MILLEN.—That is no justification for the honorable senator's feeling about the matter.

Senator PEARCE.—Why does the honorable senator say that I resented his action?

Senator MILLEN.—From the honorable senator's attitude and his remarks about it. My reasons for preventing the motion going as formal were these: In the first place I desired to direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Committee originally appointed was directed to inquire into the question of old-age pensions. The Committee last appointed was constituted for quite a different purpose. There was no direction to it to inquire into any matter connected with old-age pensions. As far as the evidence taken by the first Committee relates to the tobacco industry, I am quite in accord with its being referred to the second Committee. But we are asked to hand over to a Committee appointed solely to deal with the tobacco business, evidence upon the question of old-age pensions, with a direction to the Committee to report. To report upon what? Upon old-age pensions? The Senate has not sanctioned the appointment of a Committee for that purpose. By a side wind—I use the term without any sinister meaning—we are asked to empower a Committee to report upon a matter which has not been specifically referred to it. I hope I make my point quite clear, that the second Committee was authorized to inquire into the tobacco industry, and the existence of an alleged combination of tobacco manufacturers; and, if such combination exists, the effect upon the tobacco growing and manufacturing industries of Australia, and upon the Commonwealth itself. The first Committee, however, was appointed to inquire into the question of raising funds for old-age pensions. Seeing that this motion is not merely to hand over to the second Committee, the evidence taken by the first Committee, but is a direction to report, I object to the procedure proposed. If it were merely a direction to hand over to the second Committee the evidence for what it is worth, well and good; but the Committee is specifically called upon to report on the evidence taken primarily with regard to old-age pensions.

Senator FINDLEY.—No, with regard to the tobacco monopoly.

Senator MILLEN.—If that contention be correct, I cannot compliment my honorable friends opposite on the drafting of the motion. I can only assume that the motion means what it says. Another matter to which I wish to direct attention is this: I believe that honorable senators will quite understand that in what I am about to say, I speak with an entire absence of any personal feeling towards any of the members of the Committee. I think that it is desirable, with all the emphasis of which I am capable, to direct public attention to the fact that six out of seven of the members of the Committee to whom we are referring the gigantic proposal to create a public monopoly and to launch the Commonwealth upon a system of manufacturing, have declared themselves in favour of the proposal.

Senator PEARCE.—Is the honorable senator in order, sir, in discussing the constitution of the Committee? It has been constituted by the Senate, and Senator Millen is objecting to the evidence taken by the first Committee being referred to the second because of its constitution.

Senator MILLEN.—Surely on a proposal to refer a matter to a Committee, I have a right to question the competency of the Committee.

Senator PEARCE.—Is the honorable senator in order in reflecting on the action of the Senate in appointing the Committee?

The PRESIDENT.—The Senate has appointed a Select Committee to consider the alleged tobacco monopoly. I do not think that any honorable senator is in order in reflecting on that Committee. But I understand that Senator Millen contends that the Committee recently appointed is not the same as that which took evidence last year. It is differently constituted.

Senator DAWSON.—It is a parliamentary Committee, all the same.

The PRESIDENT.—But it is not the same Committee as was appointed last session. Senator Millen would be in order in pointing that out, but I do not think that he is in order in making a statement as to the competency of the Committee to inquire into the subject, seeing that that Committee has been appointed by the Senate. He should have objected when the Committee was appointed.

Senator MILLEN.—I do not challenge the competency of the Committee from a mental stand-point. I was merely directing the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Committee was constituted in a certain way, with a view to asking that the evidence taken by the first Committee should not be referred to the second, seeing that it is practically a packed jury.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator should not reflect on the action of the Senate. If he objected to the constitution of the Committee he should have urged his objection at the time it was appointed.

Senator PEARCE.—I ask you, sir, to insist on the withdrawal of the words "packed jury."

The PRESIDENT.—The words are not in order.

Senator PEARCE.—I insist on their withdrawal, as being offensive.

Senator MILLEN.—If the honorable senator had kept his seat for a moment I should have been the first to recognise your ruling; but if he is going to "insist," it is another matter. I will accept no dictation from any one but the President.

Senator PEARCE.—I do insist.

The PRESIDENT.—The Senate has appointed a Committee, and I do not think that the honorable senator should reflect upon its constitution by saying that it is a "packed" Committee.

Senator DAWSON.—A "packed jury" is what he said.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator should withdraw any expression reflecting upon the action of the Senate, because it is contrary to the Standing Orders.

Senator MILLEN. — I commenced by stating that, if Senator Pearce had waited a moment, he would have found that I was the first to recognise your ruling, not merely because it is your ruling, but because it appeals to my sense of what is right.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator has not withdrawn the remark.

Senator MILLEN.—I have withdrawn twice. Honorable senators opposite need not think that I fear any loss of dignity in withdrawing an unfortunate expression that has slipped out.

Senator PEARCE.—Why did not the honorable senator withdraw it, then?

Senator MILLEN.—Will the honorable senator hold his tongue? If not, I shall "insist" upon his doing so. Do I understand that it is not possible for me to object to this motion because of the constitution of the Committee?

The PRESIDENT.—I do not say that. The honorable senator can object, if he chooses, to the evidence taken by the last Committee being referred to the new Committee, because it is a different body; but he cannot object on the ground that it is a "packed" Committee.

Senator GIVENS.—I have listened carefully to every word that has been said, and I have not heard Senator Millen withdraw the words that you ruled out of order.

Senator MILLEN.—If it will allay any anxiety, I will withdraw them again. I find some little difficulty, in my desire to observe your ruling in determining how far I can discuss the matter from the point of view in which it presents itself to my mind. My objection to send this evidence to the Committee recently appointed is, as I have indicated, that it is not the same Committee as took the evidence on the previous occasion, and also because the latter Committee was appointed for a totally different purpose. My second objection—and here I fail to catch the exact scope of your ruling—is to the evidence going to the second Committee because of its composition. I do not reflect upon the action of the Senate in appointing the Committee, or upon its competency for the work. I point out—if I can say so without offending the rules of debate—that the members of the Committee have expressed themselves in favour of a certain course of action. For that reason I feel that whatever my own views may be, it is extremely undesirable to refer a debatable matter of such great public importance to a Select Committee, the members of which, with one exception, have declared themselves as holding a certain view.

Senator PEARCE.—I rise to a point of order. The honorable senator is persisting in reflecting upon the personnel of the Committee. For instance, the honorable senator holds that this evidence should not be referred to the Committee, because members of that Committee have expressed their opinion. That is distinctly reflecting upon the members of the Committee, and challenging their impartiality.

Senator STYLES.—I happen to be one of the "packed jury" referred to by Senator Millen.

The PRESIDENT.—Those words have been withdrawn.

Senator STYLES.—I object to the expression being made use of. I cannot understand now on what ground Senator Millen is opposing this motion.

Senator MILLEN.—I was not allowed to proceed.

Senator FINDLEY. — Senator Millen knows what he is objecting to. Probably the honorable senator holds a brief in the matter.

Senator MILLEN.—I rise to a point of order. Is Senator Findley in order in saying that I probably hold a brief in this matter?

Senator STYLES. — Possibly Senator Findley thinks so.

The PRESIDENT.—There is a point of order before the Committee now.

Senator MILLEN.—My only opportunity to draw attention to objectionable words is the moment the words are uttered. I also object to the suggestion of Senator Styles that Senator Findley probably has ground for his assertion.

Senator STYLES.—What I did say was that Senator Findley might think he had grounds.

The PRESIDENT.—I am afraid honorable senators are getting a little warm, and, perhaps, if I point out one matter, it may have the effect of limiting the discussion. The motion asks that the evidence taken before the Select Committee of the Senate last session "on the subject of the tobacco industry," shall be referred to the Select Committee on the Tobacco Monopoly "with leave to report it." What is "it"? That word, I take it, means the evidence which was taken before the Select Committee appointed last session.

Senator STYLES.—It means the evidence on the Tobacco Monopoly.

The PRESIDENT.—Will the honorable senator hold his tongue? "It" is the evidence, which will be sent on to the Committee, but not for the Committee to comment on or discuss, except in so far as it comes within the purview of the power given to them by the Senate, that power being to inquire into the alleged tobacco monopoly, and that only. The present Select Committee on the Tobacco Monopoly have nothing to do with the question of old-age pensions, but have been authorized to inquire into one matter, and one only. Certainly, it is proposed that certain evidence shall be referred to them, and that they shall be empowered to report that evidence, though they are not empowered to comment on it, or report concerning its value or otherwise; they are simply to send it up as an appendix to their report. In reference to the point of order, I do not think that Senator Findley was in order in making the interjection that an honorable senator "probably has a brief," and I ask him to withdraw it.

Senator FINDLEY.—I withdraw it.

Senator PEARCE.—I raised a point of order.

The PRESIDENT.—Many points of order have been raised, and my desire is to deal with one at a time. What is the point of order?

Senator PEARCE.—I contend that Senator Millen is out of order in persisting in challenging the action of the Senate in referring this evidence to the Select Committee, on the ground that the Committee are not fitted to deal with the matter impartially, having, according to that honorable senator, already expressed their opinion. I say that that is a reflection upon the Committee, in which the honorable senator is persisting, notwithstanding your ruling.

The PRESIDENT.—The remark is to a certain extent a reflection upon the Committee, but the question is, may or may not an honorable senator state that members of a Select Committee have already expressed an opinion? I am not prepared to rule that an honorable senator may not do so.

Senator PEARCE.—But Senator Millen goes further, and says that the Committee cannot be impartial.

Senator MILLEN.—I did not say so.

The PRESIDENT.—I did not understand Senator Millen to say that. Whether any good can arise out of this discussion I am not prepared to say, but I ask Senator Millen to be as brief as possible, and to try not to raise the ire of other honorable senators by referring to the personnel of the Committee more than is necessary. The question is whether this evidence ought or ought not to be referred to the Select Committee.

Senator DAWSON.—Seeing that honorable senators are so very ticklish about the use of terms, I should like to know whether it is in accordance with parliamentary practice for the President of a dignified Chamber to tell an honorable senator to "hold his tongue."

The PRESIDENT.—Perhaps not. But the Standing Orders provide that when the President is giving a ruling no other honorable senator shall speak. Perhaps it would have been better had I asked Senator Styles not to speak.

Senator MILLEN.—I never accused the Select Committee of want of fairness, but there is such a thing as unconscious bias, to which we are all subject on questions of race, religion, and so forth. No one, for instance, would think of appointing a committee of New South Welshmen to decide a matter in dispute between their State and Victoria. This is not a question of fairness; and on a matter of abstract justice I should be quite as willing to trust this Select Committee as any other Committee of the House. I should not have moved in this matter had I not felt it to be of sufficient public importance to justify me in directing attention to the fact that the Select Committee is constituted as I have indicated. I rose for that purpose, and to justify my action in declining to let the matter go as formal.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I think Senator Millen has fallen into rather a mistake. The motion is that the evidence taken last session "on the subject of the tobacco industry" shall be referred to the Select Committee on the tobacco monopoly. There is nothing in the motion about old-age pensions, and I understand that only that portion of the evidence dealing with tobacco monopoly is contemplated by Senator Pearce, who, as Chairman of the Committee, submits this motion. I understand that Senator Millen has no objection to evidence dealing with the tobacco industry being sent on to the Committee, and, therefore, it is difficult to see why there should be all this noise.

Senator MILLEN.—The "noise" comes from the side on which the honorable senator sits.

Senator STYLES.—I do not know that it does, but, if so, it would not be surprising, considering the insinuations that have emanated from the other side. I am sure that Senator Millen did not intend to be offensive, but, undoubtedly he was unwittingly so; and I felt somewhat sore, as a member of the Committee. Senator Millen says that six out of the seven members have already expressed an opinion on the matter.

Senator GIVENS.—Senator Styles may be that seventh.

Senator STYLES.—I do not think so, because I do not recollect ever saying a word about the matter. I cannot see how the motion could have been worded in any other way.

Senator MILLEN.—Is the honorable senator contending that only a portion of the evidence will, on this motion, be referred to the Committee?

Senator STYLES.—I say that only that evidence will be referred which deals with the tobacco industry.

Senator MILLEN.—Ask the President whether he reads the motion in that way.

Senator STYLES.—I do not know how the President reads the motion, but I would accept his decision in the matter.

Senator MILLEN.—Ask Senator Pearce if he reads the motion in that way.

Senator STYLES.—I ask Senator Millen to say that it is not so.

Senator MILLEN.—Certainly it is not.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I was a member of the Select Committee which took this evidence last session, and I may inform Senator Millen that, although we had power to report on the question of old-age pensions, we did not take one tittle of evidence regarding it. The whole of the evidence taken was on the question of the tobacco monopoly, and, as Senator Millen has no objection to such evidence being referred, no possible harm can arise from adopting the motion. Considerable good will result, because this motion will prevent the necessity of examining the same witnesses and of reprinting their evidence.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—The Select Committee on the tobacco monopoly, as Senator Playford has pointed out, could, if they choose, recall all the witnesses who were examined last session, and put the country to the expense of reprinting the evidence. Undoubtedly, the Committee will take that course if this motion be blocked, as Senator Millen seems to desire.

Senator MILLEN.—That is not correct.

Senator PEARCE.—What is the reason for the opposition to the motion, the object of which is to save expense. Senator Millen said that the Select Committee of last session was appointed to inquire into the question of old-age pensions; but I think that the honorable senator can scarcely have read the resolution under which that Select Committee was appointed. A semblance of force may be given to Senator Millen's argument by the heading put to that resolution, not by the mover, but by the Clerks of the Senate. The heading is "Old-Age Pensions—Provision for," and the resolution is as follows:—

1. That, in the opinion of this Senate, in order to provide the necessary money for the payment of old-age pensions, and for other purposes, the Commonwealth Government should undertake the manufacture and sale of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes.

2. That the foregoing resolution be referred to the House of Representatives, with a message requesting their concurrence therein.

3. That a Select Committee, consisting of six members of the Senate and the mover, be appointed, with power to sit and confer with a similar number of members of the House of Representatives, to inquire into, and report on, the best method of carrying the foregoing resolution into effect.

It will be seen that the Select Committee was not appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the question of old-age pensions, but to inquire as to how the profits of a tobacco monopoly could be best managed by the Commonwealth to provide funds for old-age pensions.

Senator STYLES.—And the motion to-day follows on that resolution.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes; except that the motion to-day does not propose to earmark the money for the purpose of old-age pensions. Every tittle of the evidence taken last year deals directly with the question of the tobacco monopoly. Senator Gray, who is opposed to me on this question, knows that not a single witness was examined in any subject beyond that of the tobacco trade.

Senator GRAY.—Hear, hear.

Senator PEARCE.—The whole of the evidence was incidental to the question of the existence or otherwise of the tobacco monopoly.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

POST AND TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT: SALARIES.

Motion (by Senator STEWART) agreed to—

That a return be laid on the table of the Senate giving the following particulars:—

1. The number of officers in each division of the Post and Telegraph Department in each State when taken over by the Commonwealth, and at 30th June, 1905.
2. The number of officers in each division of the Department in each State receiving salaries as under, when taken over by the Commonwealth, and at 30th June, 1905; and the total amount paid per year under each heading:—£700 and over; £600 and under £700; £500 and under £600; £400 and under £500; £300 and under £400; £250 and under £300; £200 and under £250; £180 and under £200; £150 and under £180; £130 and under £150; £120 and under £130; £110 and under £120; £100 and under £110; under £100.
3. The additional expenditure per annum in each State caused by the minimum wage clause of the Commonwealth Public Service Act; and the total to 30th June last.
4. The additional expenditure per annum caused by the operation of clause 19 of the Victorian Act No. 1721; and the total to 30th June last.
5. The amount which would have accrued up to 30th June, 1905, to the employees in the Brisbane General Post Office if the allowance known as "English Mail Money" had not been discontinued; and the sum per man per annum such allowance would have averaged.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY BILL.

Bill returned from the House of Representatives without amendment.

PARLIAMENTARY EVIDENCE BILL.

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 24th August, vide page 1410):

Proposed new clause 8 (Resisting arrest), Senator WALKER (New South Wales).

—With a view to postpone the consideration of the Bill to a later date, on behalf of Senator NEILD, I move—

That the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—I should like to have some reason given why this Bill should not be proceeded with.

The CHAIRMAN.—I am sorry to interrupt the honorable senator, but there can be no debate on a motion to report progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).

—It seems to me that it would be a pity to postpone the consideration of what is really the Bill suggested by the Standing Orders Committee, that introduced by Senator NEILD having disappeared. In any case, this measure is now the property of the Committee, and we should go on with it, in order that as soon as possible it may be sent to another place. A Select Committee has recently been appointed by the Senate, and if there is any doubt as to the powers of Select Committees to take evidence it is as well that it should be cleared up at once.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—When this Bill was last before the Committee Senator NEILD was in charge of it, and on the motion that the Committee have leave to sit again, the honorable senator fixed this date for the resumption of its consideration. Ministers have had no direct communication with Senator NEILD as to his intentions, and do not know whether it is the wish of the honorable senator that any one else should take his place in connexion with this measure. I suggest that the best plan to adopt would be to report progress, and make the further consideration of the Bill in Committee an order of the day for this day week. In the meantime I will undertake to communicate with Senator NEILD, and inform him that on Thursday next the Bill will be definitely proceeded with. The honorable senator will be thus given an opportunity to consult with any other honorable senator he would like to take his place in connexion with the measure. It is true that the Bill is the property of the Committee, but in the circumstances, and in view of the fact that Senator NEILD may have some amendments to suggest, we shall, I think, best conserve the rights of the Committee and of Senator NEILD by adopting the course I have suggested.

Senator GRAY (New South Wales).—I would suggest that the further consideration of the Bill should be postponed for a fortnight. I am personally aware that Senator NEILD's illness is of so serious a nature that it is unlikely his medical attendant will permit him in so short a time to attend to his political duties.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I understand that Senator NEILD has been given two months' leave of absence, and is seriously ill. It is not, therefore, at all likely that the honorable senator will be able to take up the Bill again this session. It is now the property of the Committee, and it is very desirable that it should be passed. We do not know when it will be necessary to invoke the provisions of a measure of this kind to enable Select Committees already appointed to obtain evidence.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I quite indorse the views expressed by Senators Pearce and Stewart as to the desirability of placing on our statute-book some law relating to the taking of evidence by Select Committees. Honorable senators, however, must recognise the inconvenience of having a Bill before us without anybody in particular in charge of it. Whilst I very much regret that it is unlikely that Senator Neild will be able to conduct the further proceedings connected with the passing of the Bill, by postponing its further consideration for a week or a fortnight, Senator Keating will be enabled to do what he has undertaken to do—to look into the matter, and to communicate with Senator Neild. Senator Neild will also, in the meantime, be enabled, if he so desires, to place in the hands of any other honorable senator the data on which the Bill is founded. The suggestion made by Senator Keating will, I believe, be found ultimately to expedite the passing of the measure.

Progress reported.

NEW GUINEA: CASE OF MR. O'BRIEN.

Debate resumed from 31st August (vide page 1736), on motion by Senator STANFORTH SMITH—

That the papers having reference to the administration of justice in British New Guinea, laid on the table of the Senate on 24th August, 1905, be taken into consideration, and that the Government be asked to institute further inquiries.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—Senator Smith, in bringing forward this motion, simply asked that the Government should make further inquiries respecting a letter which was published by the Acting Resident Magistrate in New Guinea, relating to the case of a man named O'Brien, who had escaped from custody after very seriously injuring the constable who was placed in charge of him. In this effusion, the Resident Magistrate says—

I am sending over four police, who will live in the police house on the field for four or five days, until I get definite news of O'Brien. In the event of any one having reliable news of O'Brien's whereabouts, close to the field, these police will be able to arrest him. Should O'Brien appear to any man of the field, such man is perfectly justified in ordering him to stand or go in front of him to police, and if O'Brien fails to do either of these things, he may be shot.

Senator Smith commented very strongly on this, and said that it practically outlawed O'Brien, and rendered him liable to be shot on sight. This man appears to be an unmistakably bad lot. He had given notice that if any persons attempted to arrest him he would shoot them.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—To whom did he give that notice—to a Government official?

Senator PLAYFORD.—That was the current report, and it is said that he threatened the lives of many men.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—There is no evidence of that.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I have no desire to go into the question fully, but I refer to the character of this man, as some slight justification for the Resident Magistrate's action. The Resident Magistrate in New Guinea says—

3. O'Brien was personally arrested by me at the Yodda Valley on 16th April last to answer the following charges:—Assault, three charges; robbery of gold to the amount of £1,000; shooting with intent to murder, two charges; arson, two charges; rape, one charge; unlawfully destroying dogs and pigs, the property of natives, six charges.

4. Complaints were likewise made by the managers for Messrs. Whitten Bros., Bogi and Yodda branches, that O'Brien was continually threatening to murder them.

5. A charge of wilful murder is also pending against O'Brien; the witnesses, however, have to be brought from another part of the Possession.

6. O'Brien was placed in leg-irons at night time at the Yodda by European officer of Armed Native Constabulary, R. L. Bellamy, acting under my orders.

A man charged with murder, rape, arson, and so on must be a particularly bad character, that is, if there is any truth in the charges.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That is a very different thing. Every man is held to be innocent until he is proved guilty, and, so far, O'Brien should be held innocent of these offences.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Very possibly. He was proved guilty of certain charges and sent to gaol, where he attacked a constable with a tomahawk and very nearly killed him, taking away his rifle and clearing out.

Senator HIGGS.—Was he a white constable?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I believe he was not. All the statements made respecting this man are answered categorically by the Government Resident. The Government are not opposed to making further inquiry, because on looking through the papers no reference is made to the very outrageous letter which the Acting Government Resident wrote.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That is the sinister part of it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It was never made the subject of complaint on behalf of a number of miners. It is very singular that it is not alluded to in any of the papers. Only the facts of O'Brien's career have been commented upon by the Government Resident.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It was commented upon by twenty-three out of thirty-four miners, as the papers disclose.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In the papers I did not see the slightest reference to the letter, and if there is such a reference I should like my honorable friend to point it out to me. That the whole of the miners are not of the opinion which he would lead us to believe they hold, is proved by the fact that seventeen of them wrote in the following terms:—

Sir,

We, the undersigned residents of the Yodda, fearing, from the fact of a meeting being held so soon after O'Brien's escape, that you may be under the impression that the residents here condone his offences, and sympathize with the escaped prisoner O'Brien, we, as law-abiding citizens of the Yodda, consider it our duty to assure you we neither condone his offences nor sympathize with escaped prisoner O'Brien, and, having every confidence in you, beg to assure you of our firm support in all your efforts to uphold law and order.

I have informed the honorable senator of what has been done, and no doubt that will satisfy him. I understood him to say, in his opening speech, that if the Government would promise to ask Chief Justice Murray to furnish a report on the whole matter, especially with regard to the letter of the Acting Government Resident, dated the 18th May, the miners would be satisfied. The Administrator has been asked to make inquiry respecting the authority for Mr. Griffith's letter, and to obtain a report from the chief judicial officer as to the sufficiency of that authority. When we get the report I shall take care that a copy of it is furnished to the honorable senator.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—After the promise of the Minister of Defence, I do not propose to take up much time. He has not referred to the request of the miners that they should have trial by jury, nor has he expressed any opinion as to the practice of putting Papuans as policemen over the white miner when he happens to be in gaol in fault. The miners have expressed very strong opinions about this practice. In a letter sent to me, as well as to Senator Smith, they have pointed out their objection, which is, I think, a sound one.

Senator GRAY.—Does not the honorable senator think that a Papuan has a right to be a policeman?

Senator HIGGS.—I do not think a Papuan is sufficiently educated or advanced to be able to act properly as a guardian over a white man.

Senator GRAY.—The white man is over the Papuan.

Senator HIGGS.—Does not the honorable senator place himself in a little higher category than that of the Papuan?

Senator GRAY.—When the white man goes to the Papuan's country, it is a different thing altogether.

Senator HIGGS.—Those of us who objected to the taking over of British New Guinea are confirmed in our objection by this unfortunate business. By that act we landed ourselves in a sea of troubles. The Possession is not self-supporting. The Commonwealth appropriates £20,000 a year to carry on the administration, but apparently that is not sufficient to enable the authorities to place white constables over white prisoners. Those positions are held by one-fourth educated Papuans. The Minister of Defence took up a most extraordinary attitude when he said that, because a man has a number of charges alleged against him, such as arson, theft, and assault, he must be a bad character. I observe that persons who are brought up in the Possession have a list of offences against them as long as one's arm, and embracing all the crimes in the calendar. The officers who send down reports about persons like O'Brien, of having been guilty of so many offences, really brand themselves with incompetence. How is it that a man happens to be at large in the Possession when he has been guilty of so many alleged offences? The Government ought to push on with the British New Guinea Bill, and allow the miners to have electoral representation in the Legislative Council. I believe that that reform in the system of government would very soon lead to the removal of a number of the grievances under which they now labour.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—The Government have undertaken to make further inquiry concerning one point. But I would like to emphasize the undesirability of appointing natives as constables in charge of white offenders.

Senator PLAYFORD. — The Government Resident said that O'Brien was not in charge of a black man, but had white gaolers all the time.

Senator MILLEN. — That interjection renders it unnecessary for me to continue my remarks, but I did not hear the honorable member make the statement previously.

Senator HIGGS.—If O'Brien was under the control of white gaolers, how did he come to assault the kanaka constable?

Senator MILLEN.—One might reasonably ask how it is that any man could be at liberty long enough to commit the long series of offences which have been read against O'Brien. When I heard it read, I was not at all surprised that he did clear out, as it seemed to me the only sensible thing for him to do. I hope the Government will ascertain, not only whether O'Brien was under the control of a coloured constable, but also whether it is the practice to commit white offenders to the custody of Papuans. We have been asked by interjection why Papuans should not be placed in this position. The simple answer I would advance is that, not only in British New Guinea, but elsewhere, whites hold their position largely by prestige. It seems to me that that prestige will be undermined if the natives become familiarized to the fact that they occupy a position not nearly equal, but on certain occasions superior, to that of white men. It is not desirable that we should do anything to induce a feeling of that kind, for it is quite conceivable that if we whittle down the prestige which gives us our main hold on the natives, it may lead to very serious trouble at a later date.

Senator GRAY (New South Wales).—The interjection I made may be misconstrued. I do not object to white men being constables over white men; but, as there are no white constables, I cannot see why a man, even though he is not white, should not have the necessary power given to him to uphold the law. In the circumstances, it is quite proper for the Administration to employ men who, perhaps, have led as good lives as even miners, to repress crime.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—It appears to me that Senator Higgs has taken up a rather peculiar position. We have heard that a native constable has allowed himself to be nearly butchered instead of shooting his assailant dead, as a white constable would have done. But the sympathy of Senator Higgs is given to the white man who attempted the butchery, and not to the man who was nearly butchered. I do not understand his point of view at all. The whole circumstances of this case need further investigation, and I shall be very glad if it is undertaken.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—I have to thank the Government for agreeing to my request that a judicial inquiry should be held. I am sure that no better person could be selected for that duty—in the opinion of the miners and of the Government—than the Chief Justice of the Possession. At the same time, I do not think Senator Playford adopted a judicial attitude and put the case in as unbiased a manner as he might have done. He made a most violent attack on the alleged offences of O'Brien.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I only wanted to put the other side of the question. The honorable senator's statement was in favour of the prisoner.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I do not think so. I attempted neither to palliate nor to deny anything.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The native constable was sitting down with a rifle in his hand when the other fellow sneaked up from behind and chopped him down with a tomahawk.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—According to the honorable senator, O'Brien must be a perfect fiend in human form, for that is the only inference which can be drawn from his remarks. He said that O'Brien murderously attacked his guard, presumably with the intention to kill him. Although that guard happened to be a coloured man, yet the honorable senator said a few minutes afterwards there were no coloured guards. That contradicts not only the magistrate's statement but his own. Senator Playford did not state that the guard seriously injured O'Brien, but the evidence shows that he was wounded first.

Senator PLAYFORD. — The guard said that O'Brien came on him sneakingly, and struck him with the sharp edge of a tomahawk.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The honorable senator read out a list of most atrocious crimes, alleged against this man. The charge of attempted murder refers to the fracas with the guard, who, it is stated, was nearly killed, although it is interesting to know that he was able to walk to the station, and a few days afterwards he was giving evidence, so that he could not have been very badly injured. Putting aside the question of the murderous attack, which was related in such a thrilling manner by Senator Playford, we have the charge of robbery of £1,000. The grounds of the charge were that O'Brien happened to be in the neighbourhood at the time of the robbery. But the owner of the gold publicly stated that he was satisfied that O'Brien was not the thief. Surely the owner would be the last man to acquit him, unless he was perfectly satisfied on the point. When we come to look into the charge of arson, we find that it amounts to the burning of a trumpety bush shed. It must have struck the Senate that Senator Playford adopted rather a biased attitude. I do not say whether O'Brien is, or is not, a decent member of society. He may be a despicable character if we take the version of the authorities, or a violent-tempered but good-hearted man, if we take the miners' version.

Senator PLAYFORD.—He stated, in effect, "I am fully armed and will shoot any man who tries to arrest me."

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—But we cannot take the evidence of a third party. That is merely the statement of a man who said that O'Brien used those words.

Senator MILLEN.—From whom could we get evidence on that point then?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—From O'Brien himself, certainly, as well as the person who heard the words used. Senator Playford also alleged that there was a petition signed by seventeen men, who neither condoned the offences of O'Brien nor sympathized with him. I am not aware that any white man or any coloured man in British New Guinea did condone actual offences, or would sympathize with the man who committed them. But it is significant that of those seventeen men, four signed a petition to the Minister of External Affairs. With regard to the statement that white prisoners have white gaolers, I desire to say that, as a matter of fact, they do not. There are a resident magistrate and two assistant residents, one of whom may theoretically be regarded as a gaoler. But the man who actually watches the prisoners and looks after them, is one of the black constabulary; and when a white prisoner is put to a menial occupation like scrub-cutting, work which is never done in New Guinea except by a coloured man, and when the white man has a coloured gaoler standing over him, possibly insulting him—though I am sure that the Resident Magistrate would punish any gaoler who was guilty of doing that—he is subjected to treatment which is calculated to create resentment.

Senator MILLEN.—Is that the evidence of O'Brien, or of a third party?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I am stating what is possible. Our Government in British New Guinea rests on our prestige. The natives believe that a white man is very much more powerful than one of themselves, and that if they kill a white man his spirit is much more powerful than theirs. The reason of our success in British New Guinea up to the present—and it is a success of which we can be proud—is that the natives have always recognised the power of the white men, and have never risen against them. We have never had occasion to send one white soldier into British New Guinea. Although we have 400,000 natives, trained to arms, many of them cannibals, and some head hunters, we have had very little difficulty with them. That is largely due to the magnificent administration of Sir William McGregor and those appointed by him. But directly the natives begin to feel that they are equal or superior to white men, and can make white men work and do as they like, our prestige disappears. Up to the present we have had the loyal co-operation of the white miners in maintaining law and order.

Senator GRAY.—The honorable senator's statement as to prestige is correct, but he wants to disparage the black man as compared with the white.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I think that as a matter of policy no white man should ever be put in charge of a coloured gaoler. I saw O'Brien in New Guinea. I do not think I said half-a-dozen words to him, but certainly I was not led to believe that he was such a murderous ruffian as Senator Playford makes out.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator escaped, evidently!

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—My presence here is proof of that.

Senator PLAYFORD.—What has become of O'Brien?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—He may have been shot under the mandate of the Assistant Resident Magistrate who outlawed him. I trust, at any rate, that the Government will submit to the chief judicial officer or the Administrator the question of whether it is not inadvisable to have coloured gaolers placed in charge of white prisoners.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They deny that there were any coloured gaolers in this case.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It is simply idle to say that, when the honorable senator knows that the man who stood over O'Brien with a rifle was a native, and that O'Brien overcame him and took the weapon from him.

Senator MILLEN.—Is there not clearly a discrepancy?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—There is a number of discrepancies. For instance, one of the miners is reported to have stated to the magistrate that whatever he did he should be careful to keep O'Brien safe, because he was such a dangerous man. A few paragraphs further on in the same letter it is stated that this man was a great friend of O'Brien. Evidently that is a contradiction. There is a white gaoler at Port Moresby, which is only seventy miles away from the field, though certainly it is over the gap, which is a very difficult climb. There is also a white gaoler at Woodlark Island. I think that the Government might ask the chief judicial officer or the Administrator if it would not be advisable to send white prisoners to one of those places. I am sure that would give satisfaction to the miners, and would not result in the loss of prestige which undoubtedly will occur if natives are put over white men.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We will refer the report of the debate to the Administrator, and direct attention to the honorable senator's speech.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

Debate resumed from 3rd August (vide page 546), on motion by Senator DAWSON—

That, in accordance with the most treasured traditions of British Governments and British justice, and for the cementing of the Empire into one harmonious whole, this Senate is of opinion that Home Rule should be granted to Ireland.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—In the absence of Senator Mulcahy, who moved the adjournment of the debate on this motion, I rise to support it. I consider that it is a great privilege to have an opportunity to say a word or two in support of the principle of Home Rule. It is in accordance with the fitness of things that a democratic House of Legislature, such as the Senate undoubtedly is, should pass a motion of this nature. If there is any people in the world who can speak with authority on the advantages of self-government, it is the Australians. From our long experience of it, there can be but one conclusion—that self-government is beneficial to a people who have the making of their own laws in their own way. I cannot understand how any Australian can find anything to say against this principle. I cannot understand how people who have the privileges and rights of self-government themselves should not desire to do everything possible to extend those rights to other people, more especially in the case of a country like Ireland, where the lack of self-government has undoubtedly wrought more disaster than in any other country in the world.

Senator WALKER. — Not excepting Poland?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not think that even Poland or any country under the Government of Russia has suffered as Ireland has done from the absence of self-government.

Senator GRAY. — The honorable senator does not believe that!

Senator DE LARGIE.—I think I shall be able to prove that, notwithstanding all that has been said about Russian misrule in Poland and Finland, the population of those countries has increased; and that is more than can be said for unhappy Ireland, where the population has decreased by something like one-half during the last fifty or sixty years. If the populations of Poland and Finland have increased—and I shall be able to show that they have—whilst the population of Ireland has decreased, then, whatever may be said about Russian misrule, there is clearly something to be said on the other side. Before going further, I wish to say that this motion would be improved if it were differently framed. Seeing that another place is moving in the same direction, it would, I think, have been advisable to place this motion in the form of an address to the King, so as to make the action of both Chambers uniform. An address of this kind to His Majesty appears to me very fitting, because it is generally understood that the King is very sympathetic in his attitude towards Ireland. That is an additional reason why it would be better if Senator Dawson had consulted honorable members of another place with a view to unity of action. So far, the only argument that I have heard against the motion is that we in Australia ought not to interfere in the affairs of the Empire. It is rather too late in the day to take up such a position. So long as we are part and parcel of the Empire, we are entitled to take the responsibility of expressing our opinions on Imperial questions; and this is a most important matter from the standpoint of the Empire. Indeed, I know of none more important, and therefore I claim that the Senate has every right to pass a motion of this kind.

Senator WALKER.—Will the honorable senator kindly define what he means by Home Rule?

Senator DE LARGIE.—The Bill introduced in the Imperial Parliament by the late Mr. Gladstone has been the subject of debate for the last twenty years, so that there can be no doubt as to the meaning of Home Rule. That Bill laid down a scheme of government for Ireland, and it supplies me with the definition asked for by Senator Walker.

Senator PLAYFORD. — Under that Bill, Irish representatives in the British House of Commons were to be entitled to legislate on Imperial questions.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I recognise that that was a flaw in the Bill, but considering the attitude of the Irish representatives and people on the point, it is a flaw which could be removed without much difficulty. It is hard to understand how the House of Commons could be constituted with members having the right to legislate on Imperial matters, but excluded from dealing with the business connected with England, Scotland, and Wales. That would be a clumsy way to conduct parliamentary business; and certainly a Government would find itself in a very strange position with members on whose support they could not count on domestic questions. But, as I say, there have been numerous proposals made since then which point a way out of the difficulty. It is to be deeply regretted that a question of this kind cannot be discussed without the danger of insulting references to one's political opinions. I am sorry that Senator Fraser is absent, because I am about to offer some criticisms of the attitude which he took up when this motion was first introduced. Senator Fraser then referred to Home Rulers as enemies of England. The honorable senator did not discriminate in any way, but classed all Home Rulers alike, and added that he made the charge advisedly and deliberately. The absurdity of the charge, however, is recognised when we consider the vast numbers of worthy subjects of the Empire who are in favour of Home Rule for Ireland; and I am satisfied that Senator Fraser was guilty of mere extravagance of language. Senator Fraser argued that because Irishmen were "against the flag," more particularly in reference to the South African war, they were disloyal to the Empire. But if criticism of a war of the Empire constitutes disloyalty, then amongst the disloyal we must class Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, leader of the Liberal Party in the House of Commons, Mr. John Morley, one of the leading Liberals, the late Sir William Harcourt, and nearly all those who are or were the leading lights on the Liberal side of politics at home. Even if Senator Fraser's remark was intended to apply only to Irishmen, it was quite uncalled for. Irish Home Rulers have as much right to criticise a British war as have any subjects of the Empire. We do not exempt Home Rulers from the responsibility of contributing to the cost of our wars, or from taking their fair share of the fighting, some of the hardest fighting regiments in the Boer war, from beginning to end, being Irish, more particularly the Dublin Fusiliers. These facts only show the utter unfairness of the charge of disloyalty made by Senator Fraser. If the charge was made deliberately, in the belief that it is true, I can only feel sorry for a gentleman who can hold such views, and regard any opinions from him on a question of this kind as of very little value. It may be, perhaps, that some allowance should be made for Senator Fraser in the use of extravagant language on a subject of this kind. Another remark made by the honorable senator was that there are two Irelands—one prosperous, and the other poverty-stricken and discontented. A great deal more is made of the minority opinion in Ireland than is quite justifiable. At least three of the four provinces are absolutely solid on the question of self-government. Every parliamentary representative returned for those three provinces goes to the House of Commons on the distinct understanding that he must endeavour to bring about Home Rule as early as possible, and at least one-half of the representatives from the fourth province hold the same opinion. There are, therefore, no two Irelands, or, at all events, if there are, one is very small, and the feeling against Home Rule there is a diminishing quantity.

Senator WALKER.—In the event of Home Rule being granted, does the honorable senator favour the presence of Irish members in the House of Commons?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I should not think that, with Home Rule, there would be Irish members in the House of Commons. I have already explained that several schemes have been propounded for getting over that difficulty. In any case, that and kindred questions are matters of detail, which I do not think it wise for us to debate. Several of the most prominent advocates of Home Rule have refused to go into detail, contending that all it is necessary to obtain at present is a recognition of the principle. There is no doubt that public opinion in Ireland is changing on this question, and an extract from a Glasgow newspaper, which I propose to read, will show that there are no two Irelands in the sense suggested by Senator Fraser. The Glasgow Observer of the 22nd July of this year contains the following:—

ORANGE AND GREEN.

REMARKABLE APPEAL BY ORANGEMEN.

The Press Association's Belfast correspondent telegraphs:—A remarkable manifesto has been issued by the Independent Orange Order of Ireland. The manifesto, which is signed by Mr. T. H. Sloan, M.P., Mr. Lindsay Crawford, the Imperial Grand Master, and other officials of the institution, is addressed to all Irishmen, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, whose country stands first in their affection; and, after dealing with land and labour, town tenants, the financial position of the country, and redistribution of seats, concludes as follows:—"Castle government stands self-condemned. We do not trust either of the English parties on any of the questions that divide Ireland, and we are satisfied that both Liberals and Tories will continue in the future, as they have done in the past, to play off Irish Protestants and Nationalists against each other to the prejudice of our country. This being so, we consider that it is high time that Irish Protestants should consider their position as Irish citizens and their attitude towards their Roman Catholic countrymen, and that the latter should choose once for all between nationality and sectarianism. In an Ireland in which Protestant and Roman Catholic stand sullen and discontented it is not too much to hope that both will reconsider their positions, and in their common trials unite on a true basis of nationality. The higher claims of our distracted country have been too long neglected in the strife of party and of creed. There is room in Ireland for a patriotic party with a sound constructive policy that will devote itself to the task of freeing the country from the domination of impracticable creeds and organized tyrannies, and to securing the urgent and legitimate redress of her many grievances."

Senator GRAY.—What is meant by organized tyrannies?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I am reading an extract, and I leave each honorable senator to take his own meaning from it. It is not for me to define terms for Senator Gray, who is old enough to be able to decide what an expression means, without any assistance from me.

Senator GRAY.—Is it an expression of loyalty?

Senator DE LARGIE.—What I have read is a manifesto published by an Orange Lodge, and signed by its leading men, Mr. Sloan, M.P., and Mr. Lindsay Crawford, Grand Master. It is stated here that the manifesto was also signed by others, but the names of two persons only are given. It is the opinion of this organization that "Castle government" stands self-condemned, and that political parties in England have all along been merely playing one section of the people in Ireland against the other. The people of the North of Ireland are showing a desire to bring this kind of thing to an end, and, in view of that fact, we, in this Senate, should have no doubt as to what our opinion on the question should be. If this manifesto is a true indication of the feelings of the people in the North of Ireland, I hail it as one of the most welcome documents which has appeared for many years in connexion with Irish affairs.

Senator GRAY.—It really advocates separation.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It does nothing of the kind. The word "separation" is not mentioned in the document from beginning to end.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Nor is there any reference to Home Rule.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It merely says that two sections of the people in Ireland who have so long been fighting against each other in Kilkenny-cat fashion, should be brought into one party, and should be prepared to work together for the good of their country.

Senator GRAY.—As against the "Castle" party, which represents the King.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Those who sign this manifesto say the "Castle government" stands condemned.

Senator GRAY.—That is the King.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I have a higher opinion of the King than to imagine that he has any sympathy whatever with the form of government which is so well known in Ireland under the term of "Castle government."

Senator GRAY.—The King is represented in Ireland in just the same way as he is represented here in Australia.

Senator DE LARGIE.—If Senator Gray had ever lived in Ireland, or had ever read anything of Irish history, he would not make such a statement. It is ridiculous to compare the government of the Commonwealth or of any of the States with the government in Ireland.

Senator GRAY.—I was not comparing them.

Senator DE LARGIE.—They cannot be compared. In this document, signed by Orangemen of Ulster, it is clear that they are beginning to realize that they have been long enough made tools of, and are now endeavouring to bring about a better state of affairs. My opinion has long been that the opposition of different sections in the North of Ireland has been continued in existence and fostered for one purpose, and for one purpose only, and that is to keep the people apart. It has been fostered by the landlord class, whose interest it has been to keep the people apart, so that they may drag rents and the profits of the farmers' work from this hard-working class. I take it that there are farmers amongst the Orangemen of Ulster as well as amongst the Catholic population of the province, and they are now evidently beginning to see that they have been made catspaws of in the past. It is now clear that they believe that an end should be put to such a condition of affairs, and that is a good sign. We have, from time to time, heard a very great deal about the prosperity of Ulster. We have been told that that part of Ireland is advancing in prosperity by leaps and bounds. I have endeavoured to find out if these statements are true. I have had a little experience in Ireland. When I had reached the age of manhood, and was quite capable of forming an opinion, I visited the North of Ireland, and, later on, I made a visit to the South of Ireland. I worked for some time in the iron ore mines of Antrim, in the North of Ireland, and was sufficiently long in that part of the country to gain an insight into Irish affairs as presented by existing conditions in the North of Ireland. I am able to say that I found there was quite as much poverty and distress in the North of Ireland as I afterwards saw in the county of Wicklow, the part of the South of Ireland which I visited. In the light of my experience of the country, the continual references to the prosperity of the North of Ireland have come as a surprise to me. Senator Fraser, in making his statement on the subject, did not think it necessary to advance any proof. I propose to subject the honorable senator's remarks to some criticism, and to give figures bearing on the question which will put a different complexion on them. Taking Mulhall's Dictionary of Statistics as my authority, I find that according to the census returns, during a period of twenty years from 1871 to 1891, there was a loss of population in the province of Ulster of 220,000; and during the same period a smaller loss is shown by the figures for each of the other provinces. For Leinster the figures are 218,000, Munster 148,000, and Connaught 121,000. These figures relate to a period within that referred to by Senator Fraser, who told us that within the last fifty or sixty years the North of Ireland had been going ahead by leaps and bounds. If we take a longer period, and go back to the census year of 1841, and up to the latest census year of 1901, a period of sixty years, we shall find that Ulster lost something like 800,000 people. That is surely a marvellous proof of prosperity! Here we have a province with a population of some 2,000,000, losing nearly half that number during a period of sixty years. If that is a sign of prosperity, God help the country afflicted with it. Such a loss of population, wherever it takes place, is a proof that there has been no prosperity. I have had great difficulty in getting information bearing on the statement made by Senator Fraser. I recognise that it is true that Belfast has, within the last fifty or sixty years, made great strides.

Senator WALKER.—Can the honorable senator favour us with the figures for Belfast?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I have not the figures for the city itself. The only figures I have been able to get cover the whole of the province. We must remember that Belfast is not Ulster any more than Ulster is Ireland, and the statistics of a city may give no indication of the condition of affairs over a whole province, like Ulster, in which there are nine counties. I quote now from a paper presented to the British Parliament by the Home Office, and, taking the figures relating to the income tax assessments in Ireland, I find that they do not place this much-belauded Ulster at the top of the list. It is nearer to the bottom of the list. According to this parliamentary paper, Leinster paid £10 6s. 9d. per head of population in income tax, Munster paid £6 os. 7d., Ulster (second last on the list) paid £5 14s. 5d., and Connaught £3 13s. 7d. These figures do not show any great prosperity in Ulster. In a table appearing in the same parliamentary paper, showing the income tax paid on profits made in professions and trades in the various provinces, I find Leinster again at the head of the list with £4 2s. 6d. per head.

Senator WALKER.—Leinster includes the capital, Dublin.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Ulster is second with £1 9s. 1d., and honorable senators will admit that it is a poor second when they notice the difference between the amounts.

Senator WALKER.—“Castle” influence seems to have been of advantage for Leinster.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There is “Castle” rule all over the island, as well as in Dublin. Munster paid £1 7s. 1d., and Connaught 6s. 1d. The figures which I have quoted will not prove Senator Fraser’s statement as to the prosperity of Ulster. They show that it is far from being in a state of prosperity, and is not even the most prosperous of the provinces of Ireland. There can be no doubt, speaking generally, that there is very little prosperity in any of the provinces. This is not to be wondered at when we remember the way in which its industries have been destroyed. The commercial and industrial history of Ireland is indeed most dismal reading. That honorable senators may have the facts placed before them as concisely as possible, I propose to quote from a work, Modern Ireland: Its Vital Questions, Secret Societies, and Government, by an “Ulsterman.”

Senator GRAY.—Who is the Ulsterman?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not know, but I have taken the book from the Library, and Senator Gray will be able to peruse it for himself. The author says—

“If we were to state to an Irish gentleman,” wrote Mr. Eden, “the long continued poverty and idleness which have prevailed over so large a proportion of his countrymen, he would probably answer:—‘All this may be very true, but the monopolizing spirit of our sister kingdom is the cause of it; that spirit exercising itself upon Ireland in a very early state of her civilization, nipped her disposition to industry, and, indeed, made it impossible for her to become industrious. In the very infancy of our country, and whilst we were contenting ourselves with the exportations and sale of our cattle, you made an Act to prohibit those exportations. We next gave our attention to the increase of our sheep, in order to export wool, but you forthwith prohibited the exportation of wool, and made it subject to forfeiture. We then endeavoured to employ and support ourselves by salting provisions for sale; but you immediately refused them admittance into England, in order to increase the rents of your lands, though you thereby increased the wages of your labourers.’”

Senator GRAY.—To what date was he referring?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I can give the dates of the various Acts to which he was referring.

Senator PLAYFORD.—He was referring to the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and not to the nineteenth century.

Senator GRAY.—The same remarks would apply to all other countries.

Senator DE LARGIE.—One by one the writer takes the Acts which have been directed by the British Parliament against Irish industries. I do not wish to protract my remarks by citing their titles, but Senator Gray can see the book presently, and if he finds that it contains an incorrect statement, he will have an opportunity to supply a correction.

Senator GRAY.—I do not doubt the accuracy of the statements. I only wished to know what time the writer was referring to.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The book was published in 1868. Continuing, the writer said—

“We next began the woollen manufacture; but it was no sooner established than destroyed; for you prohibited the exportation of manufactured woollens to any other place than England and Wales, and this prohibition alone is reported to have forced 20,000 manufacturers out of the Kingdom.”

Surely, in the face of these statements as to want of prosperity, there is good reason for me to urge that Home Rule should be granted to Ireland. This want of prosperity was due to the Acts of a foreign Parliament, which stands condemned by these enumerations—

“The Navigation Act had unwittingly but kindly permitted all commodities to be imported into Ireland upon the same terms as into England; but, by an Act passed three years afterwards, the exportation of any goods from Ireland into any of the plantations was prohibited, and, as if that had not sufficiently crippled the benefits given by the Navigation Act, we were soon afterwards forbid to import any of the enumerated commodities from the plantations into Ireland. This restriction, too, was much enforced by subsequent Acts, and the list of enumerated goods was much increased. I say nothing of your regulations respecting glass, hops, sail cloth, &c., and other inferior barriers and obstructions to our commerce.”

If Senator Gray will study this book he will obtain useful information. All the Acts are cited in the foot-notes, and the honorable senator can inform himself as to the operation of the provisions of any particular measure.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They have all been repealed.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I dare say they have, and I am inclined to think it was a case of making fast the stable door after the steed had gone. But the bad effects of these laws have not been repealed, and never shall be repealed, until Ireland has the right to make her own laws, and work out her own destiny.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is no doubt that they produced bad results.

Senator DE LARGIE.—These laws so disheartened the population, that practically all spirit of reliance upon English law has vanished. I do not mean to say that Irish people have become so degenerate that they cannot, when the opportunity is presented, become quite as prosperous and industrious as any other people. In Australia we have very fair proof that the Irishman is quite equal to the Englishman or the Scotchman, that whenever he gets an opportunity he requires no advantages over others in order to make headway.

Senator WALKER. — Especially the North of Ireland man.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Yes. With Scotch blood running in his veins, it would be hard for any man to surpass the North of Ireland man in thrift and industry. The same remark might be applied to all Irishmen. We know that a great many Irish people emigrate to the United States. When they are left untrammelled, and stand upon the same footing as other people, Irishmen display their inherent good qualities. I propose to read an extract showing what the American opinion of this race is.

Senator GRAY.—The honorable senator does not mean to assert that there are the same facilities and opportunities in Ireland as in America?

Senator DE LARGIE.—Certainly not. The Irishman lives in poverty and distress in Ireland, but when he crosses the Atlantic he becomes industrious and prosperous. I cannot conceive that it is the mere passage across the ocean which changes his whole nature. In the new country he is buoyed up with some hope of becoming prosperous and contented.

Senator GRAY.—The same remarks apply to immigrants from other countries.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not think that other immigrants are so successful in America as Irishmen.

Senator GRAY.—The Germans are.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Well, I think I shall be able to demonstrate that even the German does not become as prosperous as the Irishman in the United States. But be that as it may, I propose to read an extract in order to show that the history of the Irishman is not a chapter of defeat and disaster, and that wherever he gets an opportunity he is quite able to take his part in the industrial life of a country, where the conditions are fair. The extract I propose to read is taken from a New York newspaper called the Evening Post, which was published on the 10th November, 1903. It reads as follows:—

A novel analysis of the last census returns has been made by the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics of Labour to show the proportion of the different nationalities in the various industries. The result shows such a predominance of the Irish race that Massachusetts may almost be said to be New Ireland. Just where the old native stock of Massachusetts is left seems problematical, for the foreigners have an overwhelming majority in the industries—and the Irish are a large majority of them—while in the Government service the Irish are more than double all other of foreign birth, and they are about a third more than those of Massachusetts birth or descent. . . . Nine classifications are made under the head of professional occupation, religion, law, medicine, literature, art, music, amusement, education, and science. In every one, except art, the Irish are the most numerous among foreign-born, and the distribution among the different professions in this State doubtless indicates what is probably true of the race in all other States. In science, next to art, the race shows the least relative lead, but under the head of education, which includes thousands of school teachers, they have 3,506 out of 4,700 of foreign descent. So one turns to occupation after occupation and finds similar predominance of the Irish over all other foreign-born.

The census figures bear out the statements in the extract. This quotation ought to show that if a race which is often looked upon as rather thriftless, were granted the blessing of Home Rule, they would become as industrious and thrifty as any other race in the United Kingdom. Considering the awful state of poverty which has existed in Ireland for so many years, I do not think there should be two opinions as to what action shall be taken, if the desire be to restore prosperity to that part of the Empire. Although the population of Ireland is constantly decreasing, still the taxation is increasing. Let us contrast the figures for 1820 with the figures for 1904. In 1820 the annual taxation was only £5,500,000, while the population was 6,800,000; but in 1904 the annual taxation had increased to £9,750,000, while the population had decreased to 4,400,000.

Senator DOBSON.—What inference does the honorable senator draw from that?

Senator DE LARGIE.—From those figures I draw the inference that in Ireland there is the most disheartening state of affairs that perhaps has been witnessed in modern history. I do not think that it is rivalled in any part of Europe. When it is remembered that the annual taxation has increased by 85 per cent., while the population has decreased by 35 per cent., I think it will be admitted that no other country in Europe presents such a depressing picture.

Senator DOBSON.—Are the Irish people more prosperous now than they were?

Senator DE LARGIE.—No; the Irish people are ground down by taxation.

Senator DOBSON.—No.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It has been proved beyond a shadow of doubt that they are. Ten years ago a Financial Committee was appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the question of taxation in Ireland, and its finding was to the effect that it was taxed to the extent of three millions sterling a year more than it ought to have been in comparison with other parts of the United Kingdom. Although Ireland is so poor, and so heavily taxed, and no ameliorative step has been taken, still, honorable senators seem to be astonished that the Irish people should ask for the right to make their own laws.

Senator WALKER.—Is the honorable senator aware that taxation in Great Britain has more than doubled in the same period?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I am confining my attention to Ireland.

Senator WALKER.—Great Britain is supposed to be more prosperous, but her taxation has increased.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The conditions of union between England and Ireland prescribed that Ireland should pay a share of taxation according to her ability. There is no doubt that she has been paying more than she can afford. Her obligations have increased whilst her population has decreased. It is, therefore, high time that something was done in order that Ireland should get a fair deal in the amount of taxation she has to pay.

Senator WALKER.—But on a population basis she has more than her share of representation in the Imperial Parliament.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There is something in what Senator Walker has said. On a strict population basis, Ireland has more members of Parliament than Scotland has.

Senator DOBSON.—She has thirty more members than her population entitles her to.

Senator DE LARGIE.—She has not thirty more, but the over proportion probably approaches that figure.

Senator WALKER.—It is not a wrong that Ireland has more representation than she is entitled to.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is a very great wrong, in view of the fact that it is owing to bad laws that Ireland has been depopulated. If she had retained the population she ought to have had, instead of her representation in the Imperial Parliament decreasing, we should have heard something of the necessity for increasing it. Why has her population decreased? Through unjust laws. Why, therefore, should she be robbed of some of her members? And her decrease in population is not a matter of the past. It is still going on. It might have been expected that there would be a loss of population during the years of famine. But even to-day there is a constant drain of people from Ireland. Surely something should be done to put an end to that state of affairs. We have to remember that the loss to Ireland is a loss to the Empire. The great majority of people who leave that country do not come to Australia or go to Canada. The overwhelming majority emigrate to the United States, and the reasons which cause them to leave their own country harden them against the Empire. They use their opportunities whenever international questions arise for settlement. When arbitration treaties have been proposed between Great Britain and the United States, it has been admitted in both countries that the Irish-American influence has prevented their ratification. That is a direct result of misrule in Ireland. Are we content to allow that state of affairs to continue, or shall we do our best to remove one of the most deplorable factors that operate against the interests of the Empire? There is no country in the world that it would be so much to Great Britain's advantage to have a good understanding with as the United States of America, but that is impossible so long as Ireland is denied the right of self-government. Senator Walker advanced a rather novel argument when he referred to Ireland as being so close to Great Britain that her very proximity should exclude her from self-government. I would remind him that the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands are much nearer to Great Britain than Ireland is. Yet those little communities have self-government, and we never hear a word of suspicion as to its being dangerous.

Senator WALKER.—Have they the same form of Home Rule as Ireland wishes to have?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not enter into the question of the kind of self-government that they enjoy. They have a form of Home Rule that satisfies them. I dare say the people of the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man would, if they were discontented, make known their wishes. But if Senator Walker's argument is a good one, I might remind him that the distance between Dover and Calais is only about twenty miles. If we say that the proximity of Ireland to England is an argument against self-government, we might as well object to self-government being enjoyed by France and other countries of Europe. Why not say at once that England alone has a right to govern the earth, that all other nations are intruders! When one hears an argument like that he is reminded of a remark by Mark Twain, that the British people are the only modern race who are singled out for reference in the Bible. He said that he could not but think that the passage, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth" must apply to the English. The objection to self-government in Ireland, because of its proximity to England, is really an instance of that proclivity for land-grabbing which, I am sorry to say, finds its defenders even in this Senate. Statistics which I have quoted from authorities which cannot be doubted, prove that the condition of any country cannot be worse than that of Ireland is.

Senator GRAY.—As it was, or as it is?

Senator DE LARGIE.—As it is, and as it has been for many generations. I have shown how Ireland has lost her population. I have compared her in this respect with Finland and Poland under Russian rule. There cannot be other than misrule when one country governs another without its consent. Honorable senators may object to our passing this motion, but there is one thing of which they may be sure. Whether Home Rule is granted in this generation or the next, there will be no breaking down the determination of the Irish to win it. If there is one thing more than another that I admire in the Irish, it is the steadfastness and the patient endurance with which, for generation after generation, they have persisted in their struggle for self-government. Every one who takes an interest in the affairs of the Empire must deplore that this open sore has, by bad government, been kept from healing for so many generations. From an Imperial stand-point, and from every stand-point, there is reason for supporting the motion which has been submitted by Senator Dawson, and I hope that the Senate will carry it by such a majority as will show beyond any doubt the feeling of the Australian Senate on this important question.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I do not propose to occupy any considerable time in discussing this motion. It does not seem to be necessary to debate it at length, because its opponents are so barren of argument that we have nothing to reply to. It is useless to try to convince people who have no arguments to bring forward in support of the case which they profess to maintain. There are, however, one or two things that I should like to say in justification of our right to pass a motion of this character. It has been contended that it is altogether beside our duty and out of our province to discuss the question of Home Rule.

Senator GRAY.—Ireland does not interfere with us.

Senator GIVENS.—I ask gentlemen who hold the view I have indicated whether it is not a fact that we in this Commonwealth are an integral portion of the Empire, and interested in the welfare of every part of the Empire?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Was there not interference in South Africa?

Senator GIVENS.—Of course, and a pretty mess we made of that! It is a matter of vital concern to us what takes place within the Empire, and we ought to do what we can to secure the Empire's foundations.

Senator GRAY.—In South Africa?

Senator GIVENS.—Even in South Africa. The way to secure the foundation of the Empire, so as to make it enduring, is not to rely on injustice, which is the most unstable of all foundations. I shall not argue the South African question, but confine myself strictly to what relates to Home Rule for Ireland.

Senator HIGGS.—The Imperial Parliament interferes in our legislation.

Senator GIVENS.—That is so. As Senator Dawson pointed out, this motion merely asks for an expression of opinion. I have no hesitation, and I do not think the Senate will have any hesitation, in expressing an opinion on this question. But I go further, and give utterance to the hope that the opinion, when it is expressed, will have considerable weight with the Imperial authorities. We were told by Senator Fraser, and it was more than hinted by Senator Walker, that Home Rule, if granted, for Ireland would not really mean Home Rule, but something entirely different. There has been imported into the discussion a feeling of sectarian bitterness, which is very much to be deplored. I should have preferred to see the question discussed in its political aspect, entirely removed from any religious or social associations. But as the sectarian view has been touched on, some reply should be given; and although Ireland is the country where I was born, and where nearly all my friends and relatives at the present time live, I feel all the more free to offer some explanation, seeing that my religion is not the religion which seems to be so much condemned by Senator Walker and Senator Fraser. I belong to the Protestant religion, and I can say in the face of all the world that, although I was born in the middle of one of the southern counties of Ireland, where over three-fourths of the population were Roman Catholics, the utmost good feeling prevailed between the two bodies, and I never witnessed there one quarter of the sectarian bitterness that I have heard in Australia. If Home Rule would mean Rome rule, as those honorable senators would have us believe, it is curious that the strongest advocates of self-government for Ireland during the last half-century have been members of the Protestant faith. Parnell, the great leader of the Home Rule movement in recent years, was a Protestant of Protestants; and if we look at the roll of Irish patriots and agitators we shall find it almost monopolized by men of the Protestant faith.

Senator DAWSON.—Robert Emmett was a Protestant.

Senator GIVENS.—Lord Edward Fitzgerald, Wolfe Tone, and most of the Irish patriots during the last fifty years, have, with a few notable exceptions, been men of the Protestant faith. That fact disposes of the argument adduced by Senator Walker and Senator Fraser that Home Rule would practically mean Rome rule. As a matter of fact, the most trusted leaders of the Irish party to-day in the old country, and outside the old country, are, the majority of them, of the Protestant faith. Those who are possessed, or profess to be possessed, with a fear that Home Rule would create sectarian bitterness in Ireland, and, leading to what they call a religious war, would bring about the usurpation of all power by a foreign religious potentate, have no ground for alarm. I am afraid such arguments are the result of the unconscious sectarian bitterness which lies at the back of the taunts which they utter. Home Rule really means giving to Ireland exactly that measure of self-government which we in the Commonwealth possess—giving the right to the people to manage their own affairs in their own way, so far as they relate to Ireland only. Nobody has ever put forward a demand that Ireland should have the right to manage its own affairs, so far as Imperial interests are concerned. Ireland has always possessed the right to manage Irish affairs, notwithstanding that she has unjustly been deprived of the power to exercise that right. What I mean is that technically and legally Ireland has always possessed the right to manage her own affairs; and when the power to exercise that right was taken away in 1800, it was done in an illegal and corrupt fashion. If I appoint an agent to do a certain thing for me, that agent cannot destroy me in the process. A Parliament elected by the people to legislate for the people has no legal or technical authority to destroy itself, or take away from the people the right which they possess to govern themselves. When the Irish people gave the mandate to the Irish Parliament, which sat at that time, to legislate for Ireland, they did not give it any authority to divest itself of the power to legislate; and yet that is what the Irish Parliament corruptly did. As I say, the Irish people have always possessed the right to govern themselves, and it only needs the assertion—which would probably have to be backed by force to be effective—to restore that right to them. The right to govern themselves is inherent in the Irish people; and to give them Home Rule now would be only restoring what should never have been taken from them. I am one who believes that Home Rule is needed, not only for Ireland but for every part of the British Empire. Home Rule is just as necessary for Scotland, Wales, and England as for Ireland.

Senator DAWSON.—There is Home Rule in London, under the London County Council.

Senator GIVENS.—That is only a small measure of Home Rule for one particular place. I maintain that the people of England would be better able to manage their own affairs if they were not partially governed by the people of Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, and the same may be said of each of those countries. What are the facts in relation to the British Parliament of today? That Parliament, as a machine for doing certain work, has grown unwieldy, incapable, and ineffective.

Senator DAWSON.—It is overladen.

Senator GIVENS.—As Senator Dawson interjects, the British Parliament is overladen with duties which do not properly belong to it. The Imperial Parliament should have to legislate only in regard to Imperial affairs. Like the Commonwealth Parliament in Australia, the British Parliament should have to deal only with affairs of purely national concern throughout the Empire, while the local Parliaments should be left to deal with matters of purely local concern. If this idea were carried out in regard to the four countries which form the United Kingdom, the Imperial Parliament would be free from the enormous load of work with which it is incapable of dealing, and would be able to more effectively discharge the duties which properly come within its sphere. It must be recognised that Englishmen are more competent to deal with English affairs, Scotchmen more competent to deal with Scotch affairs, and Irishmen more competent to deal with Irish affairs than a whole conglomeration of them is to deal with matters belonging to all parts. As the motion, however, deals only with Home Rule for Ireland, I shall confine myself to that particular aspect of the question. I put forward my views on the general question, in order to show that it is not mere patriotic or partisan feeling as an Irishman which leads me to so strongly favour self-government for Ireland, but the firm conviction that it would be essentially good for every portion of the Empire to have the same absolute right, each in consonance with local conditions, knowledge, and needs. If Ireland were given Home Rule, the Imperial Parliament would, as I say, be relieved from the enormous load of detail local work, which it has at present to perform, and which all great authorities admit it is incapable of properly carrying out. For that reason alone, it would be exceedingly desirable to give self-government to Ireland. It must be remembered that the question of Home Rule for Ireland has been a constant thorn in the side of the British Parliament; it has led to the business being almost hung up time after time, and has made the House of Commons the scene of struggles and squabbles in no way creditable to that great assembly. To grant Home Rule to Ireland would remove a bone of contention from the arena of that House, and leave it free to deal with the great national questions which urgently call for attention. As to the right of Ireland to self-government, it is conceded by every democrat that peoples who form separate nations or communities have an inherent right to govern themselves. Undoubtedly a country such as Ireland, whose separate nationality goes back to the dim ages, of which we have but a very imperfect record, has a special claim to the right to govern itself in accordance with its own ideas. Ireland has one overwhelming claim, which I think cannot be denied or disputed by anybody, namely, that until the beginning of the last century, it absolutely possessed Home Rule, under the British Crown, and it has never given up that right.

Senator DAWSON.—It is the only case in history of a constitution being auctioned off.

Senator GIVENS. — England was the buyer, but the people from whom she bought had not the right to sell, and the transaction therefore would not stand in any court of law. It was not a binding transaction, and the Irish people were in no way pledged to acquiesce in it. I pointed out that the Irish people possessed the right of self-government, and they exercised that right. They elected certain representatives to legislate for them in the Parliament in College Green, in Dublin. But they did not give to those representatives the right to deprive the people of Ireland of their power to legislate for themselves. They told their representatives to legislate for them, and they did not give them any mandate to sell or to barter away their right to legislate for themselves. The Irish people have never parted with their right to self-government. It is inherent still, and it is only the barest justice that the British people should restore it to them. It is admitted by all English historians who have dealt with the question at all, and even by those who have displayed the utmost antipathy to the Irish people in many respects, that the legislative Union of Ireland and England was effected by the most foul and corrupt methods, and that the members of the Irish Parliament who consented to the Union were bought wholesale by British gold. They sold, as I said before, something which was not theirs, and which they had no right to sell, and that which was so bought could not pass rightly or legally. The Irish people are therefore in as full possession of their right to self-government to-day as they were before the Union was effected.

Senator HENDERSON.—But they have not got it.

Senator GIVENS.—They have not got it, but that does not in any way affect the right or wrong of the matter. They have the same right to-day as they had before the Union, because they never gave it up, and were never consulted in the matter. Before the Union they were never asked for a mandate to consent to it. It was never put to them at any election, and their right was filched from them by corrupt legislators and by a corrupt Government in England, that tried to purchase the liberties of the people in that way.

Senator DAWSON.—I want a vote.

Senator GIVENS.—Senator Dawson reminds me that the time at the disposal of private members for the discussion of motions of this kind is very short. It is not advisable, therefore, that any honorable senator should speak at such length as to deprive other honorable senators of an equal opportunity to speak, or to prevent a vote being taken on the motion. I have no desire to prevent any other honorable senator from speaking, and I am most anxious that a vote shall be taken on this great question. Therefore, the further remarks I have to make will be very much condensed.

Senator DAWSON.—I hope the honorable senator will not misunderstand me. I am interested in what he is saying, but I desire to have a vote on the motion all the same.

Senator GIVENS.—I am aware of that. A great many portions of the British Empire already possess self-government. Australia, New Zealand, and the South African Colonies enjoy that right. Even the Transvaal Colony, which was conquered only the other day, is to be given a measure of self-government. Canada possesses self-government, and I ask every thinking man in this chamber whether the concession of the right of self-government to those portions of the British Empire has had the effect of weakening the Empire? On the contrary, we know that it has strengthened it. As a matter of fact, the only great Possession which Great Britain ever lost was that portion of her Empire to which she refused the right of self-government—the United States of America. What has proved to be good for other parts of the Empire must of necessity prove to be equally good for Ireland. I am willing to admit at once that the English Government have endeavoured in a great many ways to do good for the Irish people. Of late years they have sought to settle the land question, which has been at the root of all the Irish trouble, but they are only now at this eleventh hour trying to repair the almost irreparable injury previously inflicted upon Ireland. The system of government which in half a century results in the depletion of the population of a country by one half, stands self-condemned. In the middle of last century the population of Ireland, in round figures, was 9,000,000; to-day, fifty years later, it is 4,000,000. That it is a fact with respect to Ireland, no one can deny, because it is recorded in the public statistics of the country. How was that depletion of population brought about? Senator Pulsford and others who are advocates of the great system of free-trade established by Great Britain, may attempt to deny the facts I am going to recite, but they are facts all the same. England, by legislative enactments, absolutely destroyed some of the great industries which Ireland possessed.

Senator PULSFORD.—That was under protection; surely the honorable senator knows that?

Senator GIVENS.—I am happy to be able to agree with Senator Pulsford, and I am exceedingly pleased to have from the honorable senator the admission that England has built up her industries by protection. England built up her many industries by adopting the system of protection, and at the same time destroying the industries of other countries.

Senator PULSFORD.—No.

Senator GIVENS.—As late as the reign of William III. there was an Act passed which prohibited the exportation of manufactured woollen goods from Ireland. Is that a fact or is it not?

Senator PULSFORD.—There were a number of Acts of that sort of a very brutal character.

Senator GIVENS.—It was a brutal Act. Almost every industry that Ireland possessed at that time was destroyed by Acts of a similar nature. Whenever Ireland possessed an industry which gave promise of being a source of lucrative employment to her people, England came along and destroyed it. As a matter of fact, the only two great survivors of Irish industries in Ireland to-day are the linen industry of Belfast, and the manufacture of poplin in Dublin.

Senator GRAY.—And the shipping industry.

Senator GIVENS.—The shipping industry is of very little importance, with the exception of that of Belfast. Lecky, the historian, in his History of England in the Eighteenth Century, in dealing with the destruction of Irish trade, and the English navigation laws passed for the purpose of preventing exports from Ireland, says—

Protestants then began to find that they were as little thought of as the Catholics. The suppression of the woollen trade brought ruin upon 12,000 Protestant families in Dublin—

Yet we have the so-called champions of the Protestant religion on the other side getting up to-day, and saying that "Home Rule would mean Rome Rule." The quotation from Lecky continues—and 30,000 in other parts of Ireland.

That is to say, 42,000 families were ruined by this one act of the very generous British Government towards Ireland—

By her commercial laws, England deliberately crushed the prosperity of the Protestant Colony in Ireland—

This was one of the results of that Protestant ascendancy which seems to be so dear to the hearts of Senators Walker and Fraser—drove thousands of them into exile, arrested the influx of Protestant population from Great Britain, and inspired the Presbyterians of the North with a bitter hatred of her rule.

Yet we are told that the movement for Home Rule is a movement for Rome Rule. As a matter of fact, in the last little rebellion in Ireland, in 1867, it was an Orangeman, and a member of one of the Orange lodges of the North of Ireland, who fired the first and almost the only shot that was fired. I do not desire to deal at greater length with the way in which England, in order to build up her own industries, destroyed by legislative enactments the industries of Ireland, but the quotation I have read from Lecky, who is acknowledged to be one of the most unbiased historians who has dealt with the subject, places my statement beyond dispute.

Senator PULSFORD.—But that is ancient history. It has nothing to do with present-day conditions.

Senator GIVENS.—Has not all this occurred since the Union was corruptly effected between Great Britain and Ireland in 1800?

Senator PULSFORD.—That is also ancient history.

Senator GRAY.—English industries were not in a healthy condition at that time.

Senator GIVENS.—Were English industries deliberately destroyed by enactments of the English Legislature?

Senator MILLEN.—The point is whether there are any present-day grievances of that sort.

Senator GIVENS. — There are, and I shall enumerate some of them before I sit down. In the first place, there is no freedom of public meeting in Ireland to-day. There is no freedom of speech in Ireland to-day.

HONORABLE SENATORS.—Oh, oh!

Senator GIVENS.—I hear a chorus of disapproval from honorable senators opposite, yet what I have stated is an absolute fact. In Ireland to-day, on warrant signed by a magistrate, a man can be dragged along by any policeman, and put into gaol for six months, without a trial, simply because in the opinion of the magistrate he may be "reasonably suspected of being a disaffected person."

Senator GRAY.—A man may be sent to prison here if he is reasonably suspected of any offence.

Senator GIVENS.—No man can be sent to prison in this Commonwealth, or in any other portion of the British Empire, that I know of, without a trial.

Senator GRAY.—Do we not know that every week in the police courts persons suspected of having no means of livelihood are sentenced?

Senator GIVENS. — Sentenced without trial?

Senator GRAY.—They are punished, anyway.

Senator GIVENS.—Every man in this Commonwealth, and in every other portion of the British Empire, that I know of, with the exception of Ireland, when arrested on any charge, must be brought before a magistrate. He has then the right to call a witness in his defence, to be represented by counsel, and he has the right to plead; but in Ireland a man has no such right.

Senator PULSFORD.—Yes, he has.

Senator GIVENS.—No, he has not.

Senator PULSFORD.—I say he has.

Senator GIVENS.—The Crimes Prevention Act was made perpetual not very long ago.

Senator DOBSON.—It applies only to proclaimed districts.

Senator GIVENS.—The Act applies to all Ireland, and it can be brought into operation in any portion of the country by a mere proclamation from Dublin Castle.

Senator GRAY.—That is a different thing.

Senator PULSFORD.—Power exists to bring the Act into force.

Senator GIVENS.—The Act is always in existence. I have had a taste of this coercion, and therefore I know what I am talking about. It is useless for honorable senators opposite to talk to us about British justice and liberty, and to indulge in "hifalutin." I admit that in England an Englishman has perhaps more liberty, right, and justice meted out to him than the citizen of any other country. But when we come to examine the English government of Ireland, we find an entirely different state of affairs existing. The English know that they purchased the self-government of Ireland corruptly and wrongfully. They know they never had a title to the country, because they purchased it from people who had no right to sell it. The iniquity of the crime has lain heavily on their conscience, and like most persons when they are in the wrong, they try to buttress their wrong by all sorts of unjust and brutal acts. Ireland has been impoverished by the land question. It is well known that over three-fourths of the land-owners spent all their revenues from the land in other countries. In the great famine of 1847, which decimated the country, and was the cause of untold misery and suffering to the people—

Senator WALKER.—Was Great Britain responsible for that famine?

Senator TRENWITH.—Very largely.

Senator GIVENS.—In that year Ireland produced a crop of wheat more than sufficient to feed every person within its territory. What had to be done with the wheat? It had to be sent away and sold, in order to pay rack-rents to Irish landlords living in England. When people in America and elsewhere, out of the charity of their hearts, sent in cargoes of Indian corn or maize to feed the starving people, the ships passed wheat-laden ships going out of Ireland. That is a fact which every one ought to know. The result has been that Ireland has become almost depleted of her rural as well as her manufacturing population. In 1847 the population numbered very nearly 9,000,000, but to-day it numbers only 4,000,000. The government of a country which results in the depletion of its population by 50 per cent. in fifty years, stands condemned by the mere recital of that fact. In my young days, in the south of Ireland, I saw helpless families evicted from their homes; I saw helpless men and women brought out on mattresses, and laid down in the snow in the most heartless and brutal manner. The land question has been the root cause of all the trouble in that country. I am pleased to find that the English Government have at last recognised that fact, and are making efforts in the direction of settlement. I hope that the efforts will be successful, but if they were successful tomorrow, there would still be an aspiration to be satisfied before the Irish question could be held to be finally settled.

Senator DOBSON.—But the land question is settled. Mr. Wyndham's Act will bring prosperity to Ireland, for it places £100,000,000 at the disposal of the tenants.

Senator GIVENS.—I claim to have as good a knowledge of Irish affairs as any man in the Chamber, and speaking with a full sense of responsibility, I assert that the land question is not yet settled. Let me point out to Senator Dobson that the settlement of the land question which has been attempted, has one exceedingly grave defect. Although money will be provided to enable the tenants to buy land, the fact that the landlords are offered very large inducements to sell has increased the value of the land to them, and placed them in a position to exact a higher price from the tenants. The consequence is that as the tenant will be given a long period in which to pay the price—it may be an excessive price—to the landlord, it will impose an exceedingly heavy burden upon him and his family for very many years.

Senator DOBSON.—What nonsense! The Act provides that the land shall be sold at the market price.

Senator GIVENS.—The value of anything can be run up to an enormous price if you can “corner” the market, and that is what the Irish landlords have been doing of late years. The fact that the English Government have provided money to buy them out has immediately enabled them to increase the price of their land.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator does not know the weak spot in the Act yet. The weak spot is that the money is not found except at the rate of £5,000,000 a year, but the Government are curing that and providing more money.

Senator GIVENS.—At that rate, it will take twenty years in which to effect the transfer.

Senator DOBSON.—No; they are shortening the time and providing more money.

Senator GIVENS.—It will take thirty years to begin all the transactions, and then twenty years to complete them.

Senator DOBSON.—They began two years ago, and £9,000,000 has been spent.

Senator GIVENS.—Then it will take eighteen years more to complete them.

Senator DOBSON.—Evidently the honorable senator knows nothing about the matter.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable and learned senator claims to know everything.

Senator WALKER.—Does the honorable senator think it is another wrong to Irishmen to give them £112,000,000 to buy out the landlords?

Senator GIVENS.—The English Government did not give £112,000,000 for that purpose. They made, as they admitted in the House of Commons, a present of £12,000,000 to the Irish landlords, as a bribe to induce them to sell their interest in the land. For the removal of the grievances of Ireland, not only is it necessary to settle the land question, but it is also necessary to satisfy the worthy, and I may say noble, aspiration of the Irish people to govern themselves. I think that a people are to be most highly commended for desiring to govern themselves. The Irish are a people with a strong national feeling. They have always desired to be allowed to govern themselves. I feel confident that the grant of Home Rule, instead of weakening, will strengthen the Empire. It will do good to England herself, and to every component part of the Empire. It will remove a festering sore from the very side of England; it will enable her in time of difficulty and danger to draw upon at least half-a-million of the finest young manhood in the world in order to fight her battles, if necessary, whereas at the present time she could not claim perhaps one-fiftieth of that number to fight loyally by her side. These are the chief objects which may be attained by the granting of Home Rule. I believe that the people of the old country, who are intrusted with its destinies and management, will pay a great deal of deference to the opinion of this Senate. I feel absolutely certain that if England does accede to the request of Ireland, as expressed in this motion, it will enable Ireland to join the number of exceedingly prosperous countries which go to compose the great British Empire. I hope that the motion will be carried unanimously, and that it will go a considerable way towards effecting the object which Senator Dawson has in view.

Senator TRENWITH (Victoria).—I think that the moving of this motion in this Chamber was a mistake. I, as most persons know, am very heartily in sympathy with the claim of Ireland for Home Rule.

Senator DAWSON.—Yet the honorable senator objects to expressing his opinion.

Senator TRENWITH.—I am now expressing my opinion; but the question is, What are the functions of this Parliament? It is constituted to legislate, not to express opinions and pass motions which can have no effect. What I feel is that this procedure does not add to the power and dignity of the Senate.

Senator DAWSON.—In plain terms, the honorable senator is against the motion.

Senator TRENWITH.—No; and I would ask the honorable senator to permit me to say what I have to say, because the position is rather a difficult one. When a similar motion was proposed in the State Parliament some years ago by Sir Bryan O'Loughlen, I then said something like what I propose to say now. It is not the function of this Parliament to legislate on the subject; it cannot do anything in connexion with the question which it could enforce; and to express an opinion is, it seems to me, to act childishly. I feel sorry to have to express an opinion on the question here. If a division be called for, undoubtedly I shall vote for the motion; but I would strongly urge its withdrawal.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator would rather talk it out than vote for it.

Senator TRENWITH.—The honorable senator is not justified in making that remark.

Senator DAWSON.—I know there are a number of honorable senators who would rather not vote.

Senator TRENWITH.—I am not one of that number, but I would rather not vote here. I am prepared at any time to vote on the question elsewhere, if my vote can be of any real practical effect in favour of giving autonomy to every part of the British Dominions.

Senator DAWSON.—Is the honorable senator in favour of the motion?

Senator TRENWITH.—Will the honorable senator permit me to speak?

Senator DAWSON.—It is of no use humbugging us.

The PRESIDENT.—Order!

Senator TRENWITH.—I should like to be permitted to say what I rose to say. I did not intend to occupy more than five minutes.

Senator DAWSON.—I like a straight-out opponent.

Senator TRENWITH.—My reason for rising was to say again what I shall always say whenever a motion of this character is presented. It is lowering the dignity and effectiveness of the Senate to call upon it to discuss questions about which it can exercise no control. I do not imply, of course, that the subject-matter of this motion is an undignified one. I would ask Senator Dawson to withdraw the motion, not because I am opposed to it, not because I desire to humbug, as he put it, but because this is not the place in which it should be moved. If it is carried, it can do no possible good, and it may leave the Senate open to receive a snub. That is a position which I do not think it ought to be called upon to place itself in.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The British Parliament might say, "Mind your own business."

Senator TRENWITH.—If the British Parliament were to pass a resolution with reference to some legislation that we were considering, or upon some question as to which we had refused to legislate, what should we say? We should say that it was impertinence on their part.

Senator DAWSON.—No, we should not.

Senator TRENWITH.—I should. This Commonwealth has powers of self-government within its own limits. It has a perfect right to do what it thinks fit within those limits. Interference from outside would be resented by us. The same applies to interference by us in the affairs of other parts of the world. I do not desire to discuss the main question. I say again that I am, and, ever since I have been able to think, have been, in favour of Ireland, as well as Australia, having the power to legislate in relation to, and for the benefit of, its own people. But I do not think that this is a place where expression should be given to our feelings on that subject. I have always refused, if I could help it, to express an opinion in Parliament that could not be followed by an Act. It is the function of Parliament to make laws. That is why we are sent here.

Senator DAWSON.—According to that argument, before a member of Parliament can express an opinion, he should be a Minister.

Senator TRENWITH.—I was elected to represent the people of Victoria in the Commonwealth Parliament, and to legislate in their interests. It may be that my opinion on this question is distinctly opposed to the opinion of those who elected me. Parliament is not justified in expressing an opinion in its representative character on a question as to which it cannot say that it has behind it the authority of the people by whom it is elected. I have no doubt for my own part that the majority of the people of this country are in favour of Home Rule. But the question was not discussed when the Federal elections were in progress. Certainly it was not discussed by me as a candidate. It has often been discussed by me as a citizen of Victoria; and whatever weight attached to my opinion as a private citizen, I have always taken every opportunity to give to the side of this question in which I believe. But I urge honorable senators not to adopt the plan of initiating in the Senate discussions of this character, that occupy our time, and prevent us from doing something that is our duty, and that we were elected to do, whilst at the same time they lead us to interfere with other people's business in a way that may lead to our receiving a snub that we ought not to call down upon ourselves.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I trust that Senator Dawson will consent to an adjournment of the debate, as there are several honorable senators who desire to speak. I move—

That the debate be adjourned.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Motion negatived.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I regret that my honorable friend Senator Dawson did not see his way to consent to the adjournment of the debate. I admit that one of the reasons which induced me to make the request was more or less personal. It was only an hour ago that I happened to hear that the motion was coming on for discussion to-day, and naturally I desired to ascertain exactly the character of the debate which has taken place. At the outset, I have to concur in the remarks of my honorable friend Senator Trenwith, who has expressed his regret that we should occupy our time with the discussion of an abstract question of this kind. The mere fact that we discuss it in an abstract way will not advance the cause of Home Rule in any degree. But what is more regrettable is that we should attempt to interfere in one of the most vexed of questions—one that is not viewed with that degree of calmness, either here or in those parts of the Empire more directly concerned, that we should desire. Personally, I have not the remotest intention of imparting the slightest heat to the discussion. What I protest against is that an abstract question which is calculated to generate heat, and to arouse feeling, while at the same time it does not immediately concern us, should occupy the attention of the Senate. I concur in the view that the question of granting Home Rule to Ireland does not come within our jurisdiction. It is a mistake for us to attempt to interfere in matters of Imperial concern, which are at the present moment, and have been for many years, giving the most serious difficulty and concern to the British Parliament.

Senator DAWSON.—Are we not an integral portion of the Empire?

Senator BEST.—We are, and if the British Parliament had before it at the present time some measure dealing directly with this subject—some measure giving a certain amount of local government to the Irish people—we might be more or less justified in expressing an opinion. We might or we might not. But the point I am making is that there is no proposal of the kind immediately before the Parliament of Great Britain. The problem involved is one of an extremely difficult character. We are justified in saying that the Imperial Parliament has endeavoured to give satisfaction and to calm the strong feelings which exist. Measures have been enacted which may be described as the most advanced pieces of Socialism passed by any Parliament in the Empire. Quite irrespective of any taints which might be launched against them, the Imperial Government, with a view to allay differences and remove asperities, have proposed to Parliament, which has carried, legislation of the most far reaching description. Honorable senators are well aware that the question of Home Rule is not one as to which anything like unanimity exists in Ireland itself.

Senator DAWSON.—Did any country in the wide world ever make an unanimous request?

Senator BEST.—Ireland is not even fairly unanimous with regard to it. The very bitterest feelings have been aroused within the very limits of the country affected.

Senator GIVENS.—Did the honorable and learned senator ever know of absolute unanimity on any question?

Senator BEST.—No; but what I am urging is that a substantial section of the country affected is strongly opposed to Home Rule.

Senator GIVENS.—Will the honorable and learned senator indicate the proportion?

Senator BEST.—I do not pose as an authority as to the exact proportion, but I can assure my honorable friend that I am well aware, as he is, that a substantial section of the Irish people is opposed to Home Rule.

Senator DAWSON. — One in ten in the north-east corner of Ulster.

Senator BEST.—However that may be, I am urging a reason why we should not deal with this matter. I apprehend that the argument has been used that, inasmuch as we in Australia have a degree of Home Rule, we should be prepared to extend the principle to Ireland. But there is a vast difference between Ireland and Australia, seeing that we are 13,000 or 14,000 miles away from the Imperial Seat of Government.

Senator DAWSON. — London has Home Rule through the London County Council.

Senator BEST. — The London County Council exists for quite a different purpose from that which is sought to be served by those who advocate Home Rule for Ireland. It is merely municipal government that is exercised by the London County Council.

Senator DAWSON.—The London County Council has more power than we have.

Senator BEST.—Not at all. If it were only municipal government that is sought for Ireland, I would at once admit that it should be granted in the fullest way. At present I am utterly at a loss to know what good object can be attained by this motion, or where lies our right to deal with such a matter. It is futile to argue that because we in Australia have a certain amount of local government, the same system should be extended to Ireland. Whatever government we have is subject to the jurisdiction and control of the British Parliament, which has by Statute granted us certain powers. But I have always been under the impression, rightly or wrongly, that what is sought for Ireland is co-ordinate power with the British Government.

Senator TRENWITH. — No; Mr. Gladstone's Bill clearly defined the powers to be given, and that Bill was accepted by the Home Rule Party.

Senator BEST.—I am not aware that Mr. Gladstone's Bill was accepted. I know that that Bill was fairly popular, but it did not extend the powers that were sought.

Senator TRENWITH. — Mr. Parnell, who was authorised to speak for the Home Rule Party, accepted the Bill unreservedly.

Senator PLAYFORD. — But England, the predominant partner, did not.

Senator BEST.—I know that the aspiration of a substantial section of the Home Rule Party was for a co-ordinate Parliament. Co-ordinate power is not granted to, and never was contemplated for, the outlying parts of the Empire, even for such a community as ourselves. However, the proximity of Ireland to England makes it part and parcel of England; and the very object of the Union was consolidation of England, Ireland, and Scotland. By a motion of this kind we are practically seeking to disintegrate rather than to consolidate the Union with the mother country.

Senator DE LARGIE. — Is England the mother country of Ireland?

Senator BEST.—England is our mother country. We cannot with reason be expected to accept the view that because we have local government here, the same measure of local government should be granted to Ireland itself. At the least, Ireland has a fair share of representation in the Supreme Parliament of the Empire; indeed, if representation be based on population, there is not the slightest doubt that Ireland is over-represented. From that point of view, therefore, there does not appear to be any serious grievance of which Ireland has reason to complain. If it were possible for Australia to be equally represented in the Imperial Parliament, I should be prepared to say that Australia ought to become a closer partner with the mother country with the object of further unifying and consolidating the Empire. If Australia were in as close proximity to the mother country as Ireland is, I should desire nothing more for Australia than a fair and reasonable representation in the Supreme Parliament of the Empire. That, in my opinion, is the ideal of Empire.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Would the honorable and learned senator propose to do away with self-government in Australia?

Senator BEST.—I should always advocate the most ample self-government for municipal purposes; but, in order to carry out the idea of the Empire, I should prefer a unified Parliament. However, it is unreasonable to argue on any analogy between Australia and Ireland. In addition, certain misguided persons, who are rather too vigorous in their advocacy of Home Rule, have avowed that what they ultimately desire is separation.

Senator WALKER.—Hear, hear!

Senator DAWSON.—Absolutely, no.

Senator TRENWITH.—Nobody accuses Australians of desiring separation.

Senator BEST.—Men who are avowed Home Rulers have stated that separation is their ultimate idea.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Does the honorable and learned senator not think that Ireland would be the greatest sufferer in the case of separation?

Senator BEST.—Undoubtedly, I do.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Irishmen are not such fools as to do themselves an injury!

Senator BEST.—I should hope not. I understand that Senator Dawson, who submitted this motion, is willing that there should now be an adjournment of the debate; and, that being so, I ask leave to continue my observations at some future date.

Leave granted; debate adjourned.

HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Debate resumed from 17th August (vide page 1071), on motion by Senator HIGGS—

1. That, in the opinion of the Senate, the High Commissioner for the Commonwealth of Australia should, when selected, be selected by exhaustive ballot at a joint meeting of the Senate and House of Representatives.

2. That the foregoing resolution be sent to the House of Representatives with a respectful request for their concurrence therein.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I listened to the remarks of the honorable senator who proposed the motion, and to those who followed him in support, and I must say that those gentlemen failed to convince me, at any rate, of the desirableness, in this particular instance, of departing from a well-established procedure under responsible government. I do not think there is any disposition on the part of this Government, any more than there was on the part of any other Government, to seek to be relieved from their proper responsibility in connexion with a matter of this kind.

Senator FRASER.—Or of their patronage.

Senator KEATING.—Or of their patronage, if the honorable senator pleases, though I do not think that is the way to put the matter. One honorable senator on the other side expressed his general approval of the principle that such matters should be the subject of Executive responsibility, but, to my great surprise, that honorable senator, in order to express his want of confidence in the present Government decided to support this motion. I do not for a moment suggest or think that Senator Higgs is animated by the same consideration; but, as has been pointed out by Senator Playford—and I ask honorable senators to consider the point—this motion is, in a sense, not altogether a mere affirmation of an abstract principle, but an affirmation of a principle in connexion with a particular case. Senator Higgs emphasized this view himself, but he failed, I think, to show that there is likely to be any want of a sense of due responsibility to the Commonwealth on the part of the Government, when called on to discharge this duty, which will devolve on them in the ordinary course.

Senator GIVENS.—Senator Keating knows for whom the billet is wanted!

Senator KEATING.—If Senator Givens knows for whom the billet is wanted, he knows more than I do. The honorable senator may be in the inner circle of the Cabinet, and able to read the minds of the members of the Government, but, so far as I am concerned, I am not in a position to indicate to him, or any one else, who is likely to be chosen to fill this important office. In the first place, it is absolutely necessary that a Bill, creating the office and defining the duties which will appertain to the office, shall pass both Houses of Parliament. Until such a Bill is passed, the powers of the High Commissioner defined, and the salary to attach to the position prescribed it will be impossible, I think, for any Government to take steps towards the selection of somebody to fill the position.

Senator GIVENS.—The Government will not consider it, because they have considered it already.

Senator KEATING.—That is a very unjustifiable interjection. I understand and thoroughly appreciate the sentiments which actuate Senator Higgs. The honorable senator is of opinion that by following this course Australia will secure the benefit of the united wisdom of the members of both Houses of this Parliament in choosing somebody to represent the Commonwealth as High Commissioner in London. I remind honorable senators of an argument used by Senator Pulsford. I think it is important that it should be emphasized, not merely for the benefit of Senator Higgs, but of every honorable senator on this occasion, and on any other occasion when it is sought to bring the two Houses together to exercise any act which would ordinarily be an act of Executive responsibility. Under the Constitution, with certain exceptions, that are defined, in relation to money Bills, the Senate has practically co-ordinate powers with the House of Representatives, but when honorable senators and honorable members of the House of Representatives are brought together to sit in joint conference to exercise a right of selection such as this, it must not be forgotten that the Senate will be represented by thirty-six units in that conference, and the House of Representatives will be represented by seventy-five. So that in the determination of that choice the House of Representatives will exercise a power in proportion to that exercised by the Senate of two to one.

Senator GIVENS.—If we leave the Government to make the choice we shall have no voice at all.

Senator KEATING.—Senator Givens is aware that a certain course may be followed to review any action taken by a Government.

Senator GIVENS.—After the thing is done, we can throw out the Government.

Senator KEATING.—The same thing applies with respect to every action taken by the Government.

Senator PEARCE.—We can throw out the Government, but we cannot throw out the High Commissioner.

Senator KEATING.—The same course might have been followed on the appointment of the Judges of the High Court, the selection of the first Public Service Commissioner, or the selection of the professional head of the Defence Department. In the case of all such appointments in the Commonwealth and in the States, the invariable practice has been for the Government of the day to select the persons to fill the positions.

Senator GRAY.—Will the Government give the name of the gentleman selected to be High Commissioner before he is appointed, in order that the Senate may have an opportunity to discuss the selection?

Senator KEATING.—I am not in a position to speak as to that. I say that in similar cases in the States and in the Commonwealth that has been the practice in the past. I venture to say that Senator Higgs, and those who are supporting his motion, have not put forward any satisfactory reasons why in this particular instance that principle or policy should be departed from. If there were any exceptional circumstances connected with this case—and there are not, because, after all, it is analogous to the appointment of an Agent-General for the first time to represent a State—there might be some show of reason for adopting a new procedure. No reason has been shown in this case, and I venture to warn honorable senators who are disposed to vote for this motion, that they may be establishing a precedent which will be found to be very dangerous indeed, not merely in connexion with this particular appointment, but in regard to the prestige, power, and position of the Senate as a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature of the Commonwealth. Senator Pulsford's argument, it seems to me, has been absolutely unanswered. No honorable senator, who has addressed the Senate in support of the motion, has ventured to take any cognizance of that argument, for the simple reason that he would have found it absolutely impossible to give an effective answer to it.

Senator STEWART.—What argument is that?

Senator KEATING.—The argument that if the two Houses of this Parliament act in conference in making this choice, or any other choice, the Senate practically places itself in the position of exercising in that conference only one-half of the power it ordinarily has. It will have only one-half of the voting power in such a conference, inasmuch as the House of Representatives consists of seventy-five members, and the Senate consists of only thirty-six. As our powers are equal with those of the House of Representatives in every respect, with the exception of certain powers in connexion with money matters dealt with in certain sections of the Constitution, we should be practically derogating from our own power, prestige, and position under the Constitution in taking part in such a conference. That, it seems to me, is a very great difficulty which must present itself in the consideration of a motion of this character dealing with any appointment. I feel that honorable senators, having heard the arguments put forward, will see that it is not desirable that we should follow the procedure proposed. If honorable senators desire to exercise a choice in the selection of the first occupant of this office, and if honorable members in another place desire to exercise such a choice, there is an effective way by which they may do so. When the Bill comes before the Senate it will be competent for any honorable senator to move for the insertion of a clause which shall contain the name of the gentleman proposed as the first occupant of the office.

Senator DOBSON.—Will the Government permit that?

Senator KEATING.—I am not saying that the Government will permit it, but it will be competent for any honorable senator to move for the insertion of such a clause, and then it will be for the Senate to determine what shall be done. Any honorable senator will be at liberty to move in that way for the appointment of a certain person as the first occupant of the office, and if he can succeed in obtaining a majority of honorable senators to support him in such a motion the Government must be bound by it.

Senator DOBSON.—Would not the Government withdraw the Bill?

Senator KEATING.—I have indicated the action which can be taken by any honorable senator who wishes that Parliament should make this selection. The action I have referred to can be taken in the Senate or in another place; and if that procedure is followed it will have at least this advantage, that the Senate will not be surrendering one-half of the power which it at present enjoys under the Constitution.

ELECTORAL BILL.

SECOND READING.

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Inasmuch as this is a measure which has for its object to amend the Electoral Act in many particulars with reference to administration, I thought it would be in the best interests of its proper consideration that I should move its second reading to-night, and agree to an adjournment of the debate, if that is desired, until next week. Such a course will afford honorable senators an opportunity to acquaint themselves with its provisions, and I hope by Saturday morning to have every one of them supplied with a printed memorandum which will not only give a reference to the sections of the Act sought to be amended, but point out concisely the effect of each amendment and the necessity or reason for its enactment. The Bill is largely framed on the results of the investigations of a Select Committee which was appointed by the House of Representatives on the 19th May, 1904. It included Mr. Batchelor and Mr. Poynton, from South Australia; Mr. Cameron and Mr. Storrer, from Tasmania; Mr. Fowler, from Western Australia; Mr. Groom and Mr. McDonald, from Queensland; Mr. Sydney Smith, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Brown, and Sir William Lyne, from New South Wales; and Mr. Mauger, Mr. McCay, and Mr. McLean, from Victoria, so that it was thoroughly representative of the States. It was brought into existence as the result of various complaints about the administration of the Act at the first elections thereunder. It conducted a series of inquiries in Melbourne and Sydney, examined witnesses concerning the various complaints and the administration of the Act generally; and in October of last year it brought up a report which was circulated amongst the members of each House. At the beginning of that report it is described as—

The Select Committee appointed to inquire into the unsatisfactory manner in which the last general elections were conducted throughout the Commonwealth, and the administration of the Electoral Act, and to report the results of such investigations.

In its very interesting report the Select Committee made many recommendations. It was more particularly interesting to persons who were directly connected with the Electoral Department. But apart from that fact, it contained some paragraphs which were of very great interest indeed. I think, to the general public in connexion with the electoral administration, the compilation of the rolls, the cost of the elections, and the possibility of reducing that cost by taking a certain course of action which is therein indicated. Paragraph 5 reads as follows:—

With respect to the administration by the Chief Electoral Office, no complaints of a serious nature were sustained, and your Committee find that strenuous efforts were made by the officers to bring into due operation the Electoral Act, and to secure the efficient conduct of the general election.

In the rest of the paragraph the Select Committee indicated that any little omissions or faults which might have occurred were occasioned by reason of the fact that all the officers were necessarily new to the duties thrust upon them by an Act which for the first time was then put into operation. Paragraph 20 reads as follows:—

From the evidence given, it appears that the Commonwealth Electoral Act has met with strong approval. Yet the evidence has disclosed that, in certain respects, there is need of amendment to secure more efficient administration, and to give better effect to the intention of Parliament. Your Committee has considered the more important of the amendments suggested to them.

Then follow a number of the suggested amendments, some of which the Committee did not recommend, and others of which they did recommend. With one exception this Bill practically embodies their recommendations. The one exception is a suggested amendment of section 76 of the Act, and the reason why it has not been adopted is because in this Bill it is proposed to abolish the system of Revision Courts, and to provide that the work hitherto done by Revision Courts shall be done by the divisional returning officer, with the right of appeal from his decision to a Court of summary jurisdiction. One very important suggestion of the Select Committee was that the assistant returning officers should be empowered to exercise the same functions in connexion with voting by post as the Act devolves upon the divisional returning officer. In very many instances it was found that the facilities we purported to grant for voting by post could not be availed of by reason of the fact that application had to be made to the divisional returning officer—that is, to the chief officer for the division. It is thought desirable that the assistant returning officers should be able to exercise similar powers, and that is provided for in clause 6. Another recommendation of the Select Committee was that it is desirable that claims to be enrolled to vote should be witnessed by a competent witness. I use the word competent to mean a witness such as an elector who may know or have some knowledge of the applicant. That alteration is endeavoured to be effected by clause 18.

Senator FRASER.—But he should also be an officer of some kind or other.

Senator KEATING.—No. This clause deals with a case where an ordinary citizen who is not on the roll applies to be enrolled for a particular division in accordance with the provisions of the Act. Previously an application of this kind was not required to be witnessed in the way now proposed. If the applicant is at all known he should be able to get a resident in the locality to witness his form of claim, and in some sense to substantiate the simple statements contained in it.

Senator FRASER.—Might that not be open to a great deal of abuse?

Senator KEATING.—Not so much as the present system, under which no witness is required. Another recommendation of the Select Committee was that in cases where an elector desired to be transferred from one division to another, the process should be simplified. According to the Act, if an elector is resident in a certain portion of a division, he goes to the assistant returning officer or the electoral registrar who has charge of the polling list for the polling place he votes at, and applies for his transfer. That transfer goes to the divisional returning officer of the division to which he wishes to be transferred, and from that officer to the electoral registrar at the particular polling place in such division. It was recommended by the Select Committee that this process should be simplified, and that the transfer should go direct from one electoral registrar to the other, and the acknowledgment of it should go back by the same course, so that the polling list could be altered. It will avoid a considerable amount of circuitry, and a good deal of what might almost be called red-tapism, and facilitate transfers.

That alteration is provided for in clause 20. Another very important recommendation of the Select Committee is endeavoured to be given effect to in paragraph 36 of clause 16, and that is that all the Commonwealth and State officers be required to furnish the Commonwealth Electoral Officer with any statistical information necessary to prepare the rolls. Of course that provision was in the original Act, in section 33, but it was only applicable to the case of the preparation of the original lists. Clause 16, paragraph 36, of this Bill makes the provision applicable for all time. Another very important recommendation of the Select Committee was in connexion with the issue of the postal ballot papers. Honorable senators will remember having read in connexion with some cases which came before the Court that there were many abuses or charges of abuse of the privileges conferred by the Act in the way of facilities for postal voting. Clause 26 of this Bill makes, I think, adequate safeguards against the infringements of the principles of the Act.

Senator DAWSON.—What is the real reason for having a polling-place roll?

Senator KEATING.—It is essential in order that each person may know at what polling place he is expected to record his vote.

Senator DAWSON.—He cannot vote outside that place.

Senator KEATING.—He can of course get a transfer to any other polling place up to within a short time of an election.

Senator FINDLEY.—It is not possible for a man to vote in an electoral district other than in the division in which he resides.

Senator KEATING.—Yes, it is, under the ordinary provisions of the Act. If he is absent from his usual place, the ordinary provisions of the Act, or in the case of the Senate the regulations will enable him to vote as one who is absent from his district.

Senator MILLEN.—He votes on a Q form.

Senator FINDLEY.—I understand that at the last general election persons who were enrolled for a division in an electorate voted in another division thereof, and that no exception was taken to their act.

Senator KEATING.—That may be so, but in the Act there are provisions to enable that to be done. With reference to the provision of safeguards against the abuse of voting by post, clause 28 proposes to amend section 109 of the Act by replacing paragraph a by the following paragraph:—

Who has reason to believe that he will not on polling day be within ten miles of the polling place for which he is enrolled, or a prescribed polling place for the subdivision for which he is enrolled.

It extends the distance from five miles to ten, and also provides that, in addition to stating that he has reason to believe that he will be ten miles or more from his polling-place, the applicant must state concisely some grounds for his belief. In many instances these forms were signed some time before the election by persons who, as it turned out, were not absent from their polling-places by anything like five miles. There is reason to believe that in this way postal ballot-papers were abused as well as used. In some electorates, applications for postal ballot-papers were witnessed in blank in great numbers by authorized witnesses, and then taken round by parties interested in the election of one or other of the candidates, and signed by applicants. This Bill therefore provides that any person witnessing the application for a postal ballot-paper shall himself be present at the time, and that the applicant shall make out the form in his own handwriting. Of course, there is the usual provision in the event of his being illiterate. But, at any rate, the application must be signed there and then, in the presence of the witness, who must attest it and make all due and proper inquiries to satisfy himself that the statements contained in the application are correct. If he does not do that he is liable to a penalty. In many other ways this extraordinary privilege or facility which is conferred upon the elector by the Federal Act is safeguarded against many abuses which have crept in, and other abuses which may arise in the course of the development of parliamentary election tactics.

Senator DAWSON.—What is the reason for the fine of £50, or one month's imprisonment, for a false statement?

Senator KEATING.—If a person makes a false statement it is desirable that he should be subject to punishment. The penalty mentioned is a maximum. It is desirable also, I think, that a man who induces another to make a false statement should be liable to a similar penalty. In many such cases it is likely that the person who induces another is more guilty than the man who makes the false statement, because he would be taking advantage of the other man's ignorance.

Senator DAWSON.—The term of imprisonment should be six months, not one month.

Senator KEATING.—That is a matter for settlement in Committee. With regard to the persons who are competent to witness applications for postal ballot-papers, and those who are competent to witness the recording of postal votes, although they do not, of course, see who is actually voted for, in the present Act the witnesses in both cases are not alike. Some classes of persons, like justices of the peace, are authorized to witness applications, but are not also authorized to witness the despatch of a vote. I think that the anomaly possibly arose when the Bill was going through Committee, through the inclusion in the clause authorizing the witnessing, of some other persons than those originally proposed as competent witnesses. But the persons authorized to witness the application for ballot-papers were mentioned in the schedule, which was not amended conformably. Probably that is the reason why there is a difference in the two cases. I am not sure, but think it probable that that is how the anomaly crept in. To remedy that defect, provision is made whereby persons who are competent to witness applications for postal ballot-papers shall be equally competent to witness the using and despatch of the papers. Clause 29 at the same time provides for additional persons as competent witnesses in both cases. It was found in many instances, especially in very large electorates—although perhaps we seemed to exhaust the list of persons who would be competent as witnesses—there was nobody within a reasonably convenient distance who came within the designation of competent witnesses under the Act. Consequently, the list of persons has been somewhat extended in this Bill. A difficulty that cropped up in connexion with the recording of votes was this: In addition to the despatch of the postal ballot-papers after the voter had recorded his vote, we provided that he should also send the certificate that was issued in connexion with his application form. In many instances, persons who endeavoured to vote by post sent forward in good faith their postal ballot-papers, but forgot to send the certificates. As a consequence their votes were void, and could not be recognised by the returning officer. To remedy that defect we propose that the ballot-paper shall have the certificate printed on the back, so that the two documents shall be inseparable. Consequently, there will be no possibility of a postal vote being void by reason of the separation of the two documents. That is provided for in clause 30.

Senator FRASER.—Does not that complicate the matter?

Senator KEATING.—No, it simplifies it. Instead of there being two documents we shall have the certificate printed on one of the folds of the ballot-paper; consequently, the voter cannot send one document without the other, and his vote cannot be lost by reason of that defect. In forms in the schedule to the Bill we seek to give effect to these provisions. One difficulty that many candidates experienced in the first election, especially in the very large electorates, was in reference to the appointment of scrutineers. The Act provided that the appointment of a scrutineer could only take place on the divisional returning officer being notified. In a large electorate like Maranoa or Coolgardie, a candidate might wish to appoint a certain scrutineer some hundreds of miles away from the centre where the returning officer was stationed, but could not appoint him because the returning officer could not be notified in time. We propose to remedy that by providing in clause 38 that assistant returning officers shall be competent to accept such notifications in the same way as returning officers. The words "absent from one's polling place" are not very clear in the original Act. Honorable senators will recollect that in connexion with the Wimmera election petition, it came out before the High Court that at one polling place an adjournment of the poll from the ordinary election day to a subsequent day took place. When the poll was resumed, electors who were not on the roll to vote at that polling place, but some of whom had been absent from their own polling places on the day of the election, flocked to vote; and on the ground that they had not exercised their right to vote at the election they demanded the right. It was obvious that that was not the intention of the Legislature in connexion with the adjournment of a poll at one polling place. These electors had forfeited their right to vote through not voting at their proper polling places. In order to clear up some obscurity and doubt—and there was some obscurity, in the opinion of the High Court—provision is made in clause 43.

Senator FRASER.—To allow those electors to vote?

Senator KEATING.—No, to give effect to what was the intention of the Legislature. In connexion with the Riverina election another difficulty arose. Honorable senators will remember that Mr. Chanter petitioned against the return of Mr. Blackwood, and during the hearing of the case it transpired that Mr. Chanter—or Mr. Blackwood, I forget which—at one polling-place had asked that there should be a re-count of the votes. The re-count was, I think, refused on the ground that there was no specific power given to the officer under the Act to permit a re-count on the application of any candidate, or under any circumstances. Provision is made in this Bill to grant a re-count if an application is made before the declaration of the poll by a candidate. The provisions dealing with that are contained in a part of the Bill by itself, consisting of clauses 44 and 45.

Senator MILLEN.—A re-count at any polling-place?

Senator KEATING.—Not necessarily a general re-count. It is to avoid the necessity of a general re-count that these provisions are made. The new clause is as follows:—

At any time before the declaration of the poll, the Commonwealth Electoral Officer for the State may, if he thinks fit, on the request of any candidate, or of his own motion, direct a re-count of the ballot-papers from any division, or portion of a division, or of the ballot-papers contained in any parcel.

The re-count must be ordered by the Chief Electoral Officer for the State, on the application of a candidate, before the final declaration of the poll. In the event of any candidate being dissatisfied he may make his application; and on making out a good case to the Chief Electoral Officer—that is to say, if it is not palpably a frivolous application—the officer may order a re-count of the parcel of papers in dispute. This obviates the necessity of a candidate having to invoke the intervention of the High Court.

Senator DOBSON.—I suppose there is no appeal from the officer's decision?

Senator KEATING.—There is no appeal.

Senator GRAY.—That would not, I suppose, apply to an application for a re-count for a whole State?

Senator KEATING.—Does the honorable senator mean in the case of a Senate election?

Senator GRAY.—Would it apply to a whole division in an electorate?

Senator FRASER.—Can a candidate ask that every parcel of votes shall be re-counted?

Senator KEATING.—I think he would be entitled to get such a re-count if he applied for it. It is a case in which, I think, a contrary intention not being expressed, the singular includes the plural. A new provision is inserted in clause 52, which, I think, is very desirable. That is to say, persons who are guilty of bribery, or of the exercise of undue influence in connexion with elections, are rendered incapable of being chosen, or of sitting, as members of Parliament for a period of two years. In clause 51 provision is made to enable the Court of Disputed Returns to void an election, if illegal practices be proved. Honorable senators will remember that the High Court expressed its opinion that it had no power to void an election—that, although certain acts were declared by the Electoral Act to be illegal practices, and others were declared to amount to undue influence or bribery, Parliament had omitted to provide that the commission of any such acts should be ground for voiding an election. I do not remember whether the High Court expressed its doubt as to whether it could void an election, or whether it was its opinion that it could not do so; but to clear up any uncertainty on the point, the provision is made not merely that these offences shall be grounds for voiding an election, but also that if any person has been convicted of bribery or of undue influence, or is found by the Court to have committed or attempted to commit bribery or undue influence, he shall be disqualified for a period of two years.

Senator DOBSON.—That is a very short period.

Senator KEATING.—That, again, is a matter for Committee. I have now dealt with the recommendations which were made by the Select Committee. There are a few other matters which are also provided for in the Bill, but which are not dealt with in the report of the Select Committee. These consist of one or two slight amendments of the original Act with regard to details in administration. For instance, under the principal Act, the Governor-General is the person who appoints registrars and polling places, and carries out other functions of that character. This provision has been found, in many instances, to be somewhat cumbersome, and it is proposed that the Minister shall appoint the registrars, polling places, and polling areas.

Senator FRASER.—Does that not virtually mean the Cabinet?

Senator KEATING.—The Bill provides that the Minister may perform this duty without making it an Executive act. In many instances, polling places are fixed or officers appointed as an election is approaching, because there may have been since the last fixing of polling places, an alteration in the population; and if it were necessary to wait for a fortnight or so, in order to call the Executive together, the opportunity might be lost to give greater facilities to numbers of electors.

Senator DOBSON.—Why should the Chief Electoral Officer not appoint the polling places?

Senator KEATING.—No doubt, in fact, this provision means the Chief Electoral Officer, because it is he who makes the recommendations to the Minister, who performs the duty as a responsible act. Under this Bill, the Chief Electoral Officer will be placed under the permanent head of the Electoral Department, whereas at present he is under the control of the Minister of Home Affairs; and it is thought that the change will tend to greater discipline.

Senator DOBSON.—Who is the permanent head of the Electoral Department?

Senator KEATING.—I do not know that anybody occupies that position at the present moment.

Senator DOBSON.—I thought the Chief Electoral Officer was the head.

Senator BEST.—I think that the permanent head of the Department is the Secretary of the Department of Home Affairs.

Senator KEATING.—The provision in the Bill practically makes the Chief Electoral Officer the permanent head. I am now dealing with some previous clauses of the Bill, having first desired to place before honorable senators those based on recommendations of the Select Committee. In part 3, which deals with electoral divisions, provision is made in clause 9 to omit from section 15 of the principal Act the words "a quota shall be ascertained in each State," and to insert in lieu the words, "the Chief Electoral Officer shall, whenever necessary, ascertain a quota for each State." In the original Act it is not exactly prescribed that the Chief Electoral Officer shall be responsible for this, though the presumption, of course, is that he is responsible, and the object of this clause is to make the position certain. In clause 12 it is provided that, in the event of a redistribution of seats taking place in any States, that redistribution shall not take effect in connexion with any by-election; that is to say, it shall not take effect in connexion with any casual vacancy before the next election.

Senator FRASER.—I understand that a by-election will be conducted on the basis of the previous general election.

Senator KEATING.—That is so; and the redistribution will come into operation at the next ensuing general election.

Senator MILLEN.—Necessarily, or there would be a danger of the overlapping of electorates.

Senator KEATING.—Exactly. Clause 13 is intended to clear up a doubt. It is provided in section 22 of the principal Act that if both Houses of Parliament reject a redistribution scheme, the Minister may return it to the Commissioner, with a direction to provide a new one, but no further provision is made. Clause 13 amends this section of the principal Act by adding the following subsection:—

(2) The Commissioner shall thereupon propose a fresh distribution in the manner hereinbefore provided.

Clause 14 deals with matters connected with the quota. In section 23 of the principal Act it was simply provided—

A redistribution of any State into divisions shall be made in the manner hereinbefore provided whenever directed by the Governor-General by proclamation.

There is no indication of the times or occasions on which such a proclamation shall issue, and, therefore, by clause 14, section 23 of the principal Act is amended by adding the following subsection:—

Such proclamation may be made—

- (a) whenever an alteration is made in the number of members of the House of Representatives to be elected for the State; and
- (b) whenever in one-third of the divisions in the State the number of electors differs from a quota ascertained in the manner provided in this Part by a greater extent than one-fifth more or one-fifth less; and
- (c) at such other times as the Governor-General thinks fit.

Of course, these provisions merely indicate the occasions on which a proclamation shall issue. If those events occur, and a proclamation does not issue, obviously those who are responsible for the administration of the Act are guilty of neglect, and the responsibility is thrown upon them. Part IV., which is very important, makes new provisions in connexion with polling places and subdivisions. The clauses in this division repeal the whole of Part IV. of the principal Act, which is very small, consisting of only three clauses. The sections in the principal Act are 24, 25, and 26. Section 24 provides for the Governor-General proclaiming polling places or the cessation of a place as a polling place; section 25 provides for a report as to the polling places by the Commonwealth Electoral Officer, specifying what polling places are required; and section 26 provides where electors are to vote in case of a polling place having been abolished. Part IV. consists of one clause and paragraphs 24, 25, and 26. Paragraph 24 provides that the Governor-General may in any case in which he thinks fit to do so, by proclamation, divide any division into subdivisions. I shall deal with this paragraph after I have given the purport of the other two. Paragraph 25 provides that the Minister may by notice in the Gazette—

- (a) appoint a chief polling place for each division;
- (b) appoint such other polling places for each division as he thinks necessary;
- (c) abolish any polling place;
- (d) establish a polling place area for any specified polling place and fix its boundaries.

Provided that no polling place shall be abolished or polling place area be established after the issue of the writ and before the time appointed for its return.

Substantially, paragraph 25 is a re-enactment of the section in the original Act, only that the power is transferred from the Governor-General to the Minister, with the additional authority to establish a polling-place area for any specified polling place, and fix the boundaries; that is, to indicate what particular boundary around a polling place shall be the polling area, so that all the electors within that area may be able to recognise their particular polling place.

Senator MILLEN.—Have we not that in the present Act?

Senator KEATING.—There is no provision for the polling-place area in the original Act.

Senator MILLEN.—Is it not there under another name?

Senator KEATING.—But the provision in the principal Act is not altogether in regard to fixed or defined boundaries, and there may be the possibility of overlapping. The original provision was found, in some of the thickly-populated centres, to be inconvenient for electors; and it is thought that if these areas are established they will facilitate the collection of names for the lists, and enable the elector to know to which polling place he has to go.

Senator DOBSON.—Will that not mean more expense?

Senator KEATING.—No; it is only a definition of the boundary of a polling place. Take, for instance, the city of Melbourne; if a polling place is established, the boundary of it may not be particularly described, and this is only an optional power to facilitate the collection of names, and the reference on the part of the electors themselves to the lists.

Senator DOBSON.—When making out the polling lists, there must be a polling area.

Senator KEATING.—Whatever provision there is in the principal Act, it has not been found to meet the case either for those who are responsible for the collection of the lists, or for the electors themselves.

Senator MILLEN.—An elector will be able to refer to a geographical area, rather than to a list of names.

Senator KEATING.—In some places in the country that will be so; the elector may know the boundary, and he need not consult the list. Paragraph 26 is a provision consequential on the two previous paragraphs. The first paragraph in this part of the Bill, as I have already said, provides that the Governor-General may, in any case in which he thinks fit to do so, by proclamation, divide any division into sub-divisions. This looks a simple clause of little consequence, but it is one of great importance. Honorable senators will understand that many Commonwealth electorates in numerical strength may be equal to four or five State electorates, and it has been thought desirable to harmonize the State and Commonwealth electoral administration wherever practicable. If that can be done, it will result in great convenience and economy to both Commonwealth and States.

Senator MILLEN.—The proposal is to make the electorates co-terminus as far as possible?

Senator KEATING.—That is the proposal. For instance, there may be a Commonwealth electorate containing 30,000 electors, and the State authorities, in mapping out their divisions, may decide to divide that Commonwealth electorate into three State electorates. This provision, in such case, will enable the Governor-General to make each such State electorate a sub-division of the Commonwealth electoral division; and then the rolls used for the Commonwealth sub-division may also be used as the rolls for it as a State division. This is simply a power given to the Governor-General, which he may exercise, so that the same rolls and same officers may be utilized, and expense thus saved.

Senator FRASER.—The chances are that such a scheme will never work.

Senator KEATING.—At any rate, we can do no harm in endeavouring to bring about such a desirable state of things. It may also be found possible to make two parts of a State electoral district two subdivisions of two Commonwealth districts.

Senator FRASER.—There is more likely to be help in that way than in the other.

Senator KEATING.—In various ways it may be possible to map out our subdivisions in harmony with State divisions. It will interest honorable senators to know that, in the report of the Select Committee, reference is made to the expenditure involved in our elections, and also to the possibilities of reducing expenditure in the case of future elections. I find this statement in paragraph 10 of the report—

The Department is to be commended upon the considerable economies made in the conduct of the second general election. For the purpose of the Commonwealth elections of 1901 there were 974,594 electors enrolled, and the cost of the election was £56,331 11s. 1d. At the election held in December last there were 1,893,000 electors, and the cost of the election was about £45,000. Except, as elsewhere indicated in this report, your Committee do not see how any further reduction in the cost can be effected if the officers employed are to be paid in proportion to the services rendered.

Senator GRAY.—It was generally reported that the payments made to persons employed in connexion with the last elections were extremely small.

Senator DE LARGIE.—How does the cost compare with the cost of State elections?

Senator KEATING.—I have not the figures for State elections.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable and learned senator has given the aggregate cost under the States' system in giving the cost of the first Commonwealth election.

Senator KEATING.—The cost of the first election was £56,331 11s. 1d. The Committee say further—

The special franchise of the Commonwealth necessitated a complete collection of the names of the persons entitled to be enrolled as electors. This task involved the collection of the names of nearly 2,000,000 persons. Your Committee consider no better scheme could have been devised than the house to house collection. Then in paragraph 13 of their report they say—

The evidence reveals that a great saving to the Australian people could be effected by the adoption of a uniform franchise and electoral system. By the acceptance of the uniform franchise and polling-places in common, the one collection and revision of names, and the one set of rolls could be made to serve both the Commonwealth and States. In South Australia, by the utilization of the State roll, the cost of printing the Commonwealth roll for that State amounted to £500 instead of £1,800. In Victoria the Government Printer estimates that by being able to use the State rolls a saving could be made to that State of £2,500 per annum. Further economies would result if the same sets of officers could do the electoral duties for both Commonwealth and States.

Senator BEST.—There cannot possibly be the same saving in Victoria as in South Australia, because there is adult suffrage in South Australia, and only adult male suffrage in Victoria.

Senator KEATING.—Where the State franchise is not in harmony with the Commonwealth franchise, it is thought that the rolls might be printed in such a way that where an elector is entitled to be only on the State roll or the Commonwealth roll, and not on both, there may be a certain column provided on the roll in which that can be indicated.

Senator MILLEN.—That would be a most dangerous thing.

Senator KEATING.—That is one way in which to get over the difficulty. So far as Senator Best's interjection is concerned, we all know that Victoria now stands alone in denying the franchise to women, and possibly it will not be long before that State is in line with the other States in that regard. At any rate, economies can be exercised in this direction in all the States, excepting Victoria, and we should not do well if we did not take advantage of the recommendation of the Select Committee to make such elastic provisions in our Bill as will enable us, should the opportunity arise, to give being to such a very desirable state of things. I remind honorable senators that at the Premiers' Conference held in Hobart, the matter was discussed, and on page 84 of the report of the Conference, honorable senators will find that Mr. Dugald Thomson moved, the Premier of Tasmania seconded, and the Conference agreed, to the following resolution:—

That this Conference agrees that the Commonwealth and State Government should consider the question of amending their electoral laws, with the object of making the qualification and disqualification of electors as nearly uniform as may be deemed possible and desirable, and that communications should be at once entered upon by the Electoral and Law Department of the Commonwealth and States, with the object of the nearest possible approach to uniformity in the mode of enrolment, mode of revision, establishment of polling-places, and other mechanism of an Electoral Act.

It is not stated whether that motion was agreed to unanimously, but there seems to have been no expression of dissent on the part of Victorian representatives to the suggested harmonization of the franchises, and that may be considered a hopeful sign that Victoria will shortly be brought into line with the other States in this matter. Part V. of the Bill repeals in toto sections 27 to 54 inclusive of the principal Act. It proposes the enactment of some new sections, and the re-enactment of some of the sections of the present Act, which are to be repealed, but for greater convenience it repeals the whole of the sections to which I have referred, so that those to be re-enacted may be expressed in better verbiage, and with the advantage of the experience of their practical working. The main reasons why these sections are repealed is that they were largely framed to meet the peculiar circumstances attaching to the preparation of the first rolls. By the preparation of those rolls the operation of most of these sections has been exhausted. I indicated in the course of my remarks that it was proposed to abolish the Revision Courts, and to propose that divisional returning officers should do the work now done by those Courts. It will be interesting for honorable senators to learn that the Revision Court system, so far as the preparation of the rolls is concerned, has been found to be unworkable and unsatisfactory. Of course the system originated with Courts of Revision that were held in the old country, and charged with the responsibility of inquiring into the eligibility or title of individuals to the franchise. Where there were difficult and knotty questions to determine, that system was very likely a desirable piece of machinery for the purpose of solving them. We all know that revising barristers were appointed in connexion with those Courts to study the qualifications or disqualifications of applicants for the position of an elector. But when we have the simple qualifications of adult age, and residence in Australia for a certain time, these nice and intricate questions cannot possibly arise, and in actual experience it is found that the public take the very slightest possible interest in the work of the Revision Courts. These figures will no doubt interest honorable senators. During the months of March, April, and May of this year Revision Courts have been held at 327 centres throughout the seventy-five electorates of the Commonwealth, and not more than fifty alterations have been made in the rolls as the result of any action on the part of the public. At present no names can be removed from the rolls unless upon action by a Revision Court, by the death of an elector, or by the transfer of an elector from one roll to another. A curious anomaly arose in connexion with this. In the Riverina district there were a number of full-blooded aboriginals, who were on the New South Wales State roll, and by virtue of the operation of section 41 of the Constitution they were entitled to be placed, and were placed, on the Commonwealth electoral roll. I do not know whether they were subsequently disfranchised in New South Wales, but I am informed that for some reason or another they ceased to be qualified as electors for the State Parliament, and their qualification as electors for the Commonwealth Parliament also ceased. But they could not be removed from the Commonwealth roll. They were not dead, they had not been transferred, no Revision Court was held that could deal with their case, their names were allowed to remain on the roll, and they were allowed to exercise the franchise in violation of the whole spirit of the law dealing with the matter.

Senator PEARCE.—Does that small instance justify the abolition of the Revision Courts?

Senator KEATING.—I did not give only that instance. I pointed out that in three months of the year 327 Courts have been held throughout the seventy-five electorates of the Commonwealth, and that at those Courts there were not more than fifty alterations made in the rolls as the result of action taken by the public.

Senator PEARCE.—That very fact might justify the continuation of the Revision Courts.

Senator KEATING.—A great majority of the alterations made are due to the fact that people have removed from one district to another without getting their names transferred, or are otherwise disqualified, and most of these cases are generally known to the returning officers.

Senator BEST.—Do police magistrates do the work of the Revision Courts?

Senator KEATING.—It has usually been done, I think, by two justices of the peace.

Senator BEST.—In Victoria the work is done by police magistrates. If the divisional returning officers are to do all this work they will be engaged in travelling about for weeks.

Senator KEATING.—I think not. The Revision Courts as a rule sit only at one place in each electorate.

Senator BEST.—But Revision Courts are held at a number of places in large electorates.

Senator KEATING.—I think not, though I do not speak with any certainty.

Senator BEST.—The proposal does not involve the employment of a number of new officials?

Senator KEATING.—No. It is provided in Part VII. of the Bill that any name on a roll may be objected to by objection in writing, lodged with or made by the returning officer. The form of the objection is provided for, and the duty is cast upon the returning officer and the registrar, if they know that the names ought not to be on the roll, to lodge the objection. They must lodge the objection themselves, and then it is provided that—

70. The returning officer shall, forthwith, give notice of the objection to the person objected to. The notice may be in the prescribed form, and be served by posting it to the last-known place of abode of the person objected to, or, if that is not known, then to the place of living appearing on the roll.

71. The person objected to may, orally or in writing, in the prescribed manner, answer the objection.

When the matter is determined either way, an appeal will lie to a Court of summary jurisdiction with ample powers.

Senator STEWART.—Who will determine the matter in the first instance?

Senator KEATING.—The returning officer for the district.

Senator DOBSON.—There will be one officer for each electorate?

Senator KEATING.—Yes.

Senator STEWART.—It will never work.

Senator BEST.—His own objection will not be overruled.

Senator KEATING.—The officer has to notify the person who is objected to that an objection has been lodged against him, and the latter may, orally or in writing, answer it.

Senator STEWART.—It will never do.

Senator KEATING.—What does the work of a Revision Court amount to in these times? When it sits the returning officer, or the registrar, or some other official, rises and says—"These persons have left the district." Practically you have all the machinery of the Revision Court doing in its name what these officers inspire them to do. The proposal is to say straight out that the electoral officer is to undertake this work.

Senator PEARCE.—The difference is that the man who makes the objection is not the one who strikes the name off the roll.

Senator KEATING.—The difference is that the man now has no right of appeal from the Revision Court, whereas under this Bill there is an electoral officer from whose decision an appeal will lie to a Court of summary jurisdiction. Sub-clause 6 of clause 73 says—

A police stipendiary, or special magistrate, or two justices of the peace, authorized as above-mentioned, though not sitting as a Court of summary jurisdiction, shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be, and shall have all the powers of a Court of summary jurisdiction.

That provision gives the greatest possible facilities for making appeals. An appellant will not be required to wait a fortnight or a week for a Court of petty sessions to be held at a particular centre; but he can ask that two justices of the peace shall sit, not as a Court of summary jurisdiction, but to determine his appeal alone.* I think that, on reflection, honorable senators will see that this system will work very much better in the interest of all parties, and will conduce to a far better administration of the Electoral Act.

Senator DOBSON.—Another argument in the Minister's favour is that as property and educational qualifications have been done away with, the Revision Courts are not half so important as they used to be.

Senator KEATING.—These qualifications were the origin of the Revision Courts. They may do very well in countries where complicated and intricate questions of qualifications arise, but here, where the qualification depends upon adult suffrage, with residence in the Commonwealth for a certain period, the necessity for Revision Courts and revising counsel has disappeared. Practically in all the States which have had an extended franchise, the Revision Courts have been working to a large extent only in name. What do justices of the peace know of the names on the roll? The public do not attend the Courts. The illustration I gave of 327 Revision Courts having been held this year illustrates that fact and any alterations on the rolls were made in this particular method. In addition to that, we are providing a safeguard against the possibility of abuse, which is just as likely to creep in under one system as under the other.

Senator PEARCE. — The trouble is that where the abuse does creep in, and the returning officer misuses his power, the elector finds out the fact too late—on the day of election.

Senator KEATING. — The same thing may happen under the present system, under which he has no right of appeal.

Senator STEWART.—Cannot the Minister supply us with a copy of the principal Act, as well as the memorandum, showing the reason for each amendment thereof?

Senator KEATING.—In order to facilitate the study of this Bill by honorable senators, I shall supply them as early as possible—perhaps to-morrow—with a copy of the principal Act, and a memorandum which will clearly indicate, in concise form, the effect of each amendment, and the necessity or reason for its enactment.

Senator DOBSON. — I suppose the Government considered the question of whether it was better to amend the Act than to introduce an entirely new Bill?

Senator KEATING.—If an entirely new Bill were submitted, it would be very difficult for honorable senators to appreciate where an alteration was being made.

Senator BEST.—Not unless it was shown in different type.

Senator KEATING.—That method has been adopted, but experience has shown that it is attended with some difficulties.

Senator MILLEN. — This is only an amending Bill. It does not affect a large portion of the principal Act.

Senator KEATING. — Exactly. The last clause provides that in future, when the Government Printer prints the main Act, he shall print it with all the necessary omissions and insertions occasioned by the passing of this or any other amending Bill. That has been the practice in Queensland. The present print of our Defence Act . . . of the principal Act, with all the omissions and insertions occasioned by the passing of the amending Bill of last session. At first sight, it may appear to be a dangerous system, but with the exercise of care and caution, such as are invariably exhibited by the Clerks in connexion with our Bills, it will work very well, and greatly conduce to the convenience of the public, and those who have to consult the Acts. I may say that the Government have considered whether it is not advisable to bring in a short Bill with a general provision of that kind.

Senator DOBSON.—Has the Cabinet considered the question of compulsory voting?

Senator KEATING.—No recommendation on that subject was made by the Select Committee, and this Bill simply deals with the administrative features of the Electoral Act, and the other matters to which I have referred. If honorable senators will apply themselves to the consideration of the memorandum I shall circulate, I think they will come here next week and find that the object of this Bill is to provide for the greatest possible facilities to be given to electors to record their votes, the simplification of the administrative machinery of the Act, and the guarding against any abuse or infringement of the law.

Debate (on motion by Senator MILLEN) adjourned.

APPROPRIATION (WORKS AND BUILDINGS) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

I do not intend to occupy the time of honorable senators very long in submitting this Bill for their consideration. It makes a departure from the usual practice, and, I think, a very wise and proper one. The appropriations for the services of the year have been divided into two parts. The general Estimates of Expenditure will be embodied in the ordinary Appropriation Bill, which will come up to the Senate in due course. This Bill appropriates the money for new works which are required in various parts of the Commonwealth. Hitherto the Senate has had to wait for the Appropriation Bill until Parliament was on the eve of prorogation. Very properly, a Parliament will not give up its hold upon the purse strings until the last possible moment, because directly the annual Appropriation Bill is passed, the Ministry have the whip-hand, and can prorogue at any moment. In the old country, as well as in the various States of the Commonwealth, the Parliament has very naturally delayed the appropriations for the year until honorable members have been quite satisfied that it was time to prorogue. The result of that practice in this Parliament has been that a number of public works which were provided for in the annual Appropriation Act could not, in some instances, even be taken in hand, and in many instances could only be partly proceeded with in the financial year, with the consequence that a large re-vote was required in the next financial year. Usually the prorogation has not taken place until the warm weather has begun to affect honorable members, and as the Christmas holidays came immediately afterwards the works could not be put in hand for some time. Consequently, the re-votes for this year are very large. It is certainly desirable that the construction of public works should be authorized as early as possible in the financial year, so that they may be taken in hand and the necessity for asking for large re-votes avoided. For that reason it was decided to appropriate the money for public works in a special Bill. This is really a measure for discussion in Committee rather than in the Senate. Of course I am supplied with all the requisite information concerning each item, but sometimes it is difficult to pick out the information exactly as it is desired by honorable senators. In Committee I hope to be able to furnish satisfactory information concerning every item. The Bill provides for the appropriation of £418,911 for the construction of public works. Last year the appropriation for this purpose amounted to £404,240, of which £67,766 was unspent at the end of the financial year, and of which we require to re-vote £51,000. Under the head of Trade and Customs we are asked to vote only £2,164, of which £1,979 is a re-vote. The additions to the Sydney Custom House absorb £1,909. We were not able to get on with that work last year, although the money was voted, and therefore a re-vote is required. On Defence works, we propose to expend £13,818 in New South Wales, £11,717 in Victoria, £7,577 in Queensland, £4,085 in South Australia, and £25,223 in Western Australia.

Senator HIGGS.—Why did the Minister emphasize the figures for Western Australia?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Because it is a very large sum, about which I dare say honorable senators will want an explanation, which I shall be very happy to give in Committee. It is required for a fort at Fremantle, which is estimated to cost £80,000. As we know, in a great many instances the estimates are considerably exceeded, and I should not be surprised to find that the amount runs closer to £100,000 than £80,000 before the work is finished.

Senator WALKER.—Is there anything for the harbor at Esperance?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No; we have nothing to do with Esperance or its harbor. The total Defence vote is £66,516, of which £26,245 is a re-vote, and £40,271 is for new service. As to Post and Telegraphs, we propose to spend in New South Wales, £21,250; in Victoria, £20,137; in Queensland, £7,145; in South Australia, £5,624; in Western Australia, £25,425. On telegraphs and telephones we propose to spend in New South Wales £63,000; in Victoria, £37,750; in Queensland, £17,000; in South Australia, £20,400; in Western Australia, £23,000; and in Tasmania, £8,000. That is a summary of the principal sums to be expended. Amongst the amounts I have enumerated are included items of which I shall be glad to give details in Committee. One of the principal votes for telephones is that for the construction of a line from Melbourne to Sydney. It is a work which is urgently required, and the Post Office officials consider that it will pay interest on the money from the start. Honorable senators will see on page 17 of the Bill details of expenditure under the control of the Department of Defence. Certain special defence material, costing, as estimated, £178,045, is detailed, and on the following page are other items making the total £181,060, of which we consider that £41,060 will not be required during the present year; leaving a total of £140,000 for defence purposes.

Senator MATHESON.—What is the object of putting in the larger amount if it is not all to be expended?

Senator PLAYFORD.—We cannot take off particular amounts for particular works, but we take off a lump sum from the whole of the works, because we consider that that amount will not be spent by the end of the financial year. So much will be taken off one line, and so much off another. We do not know where the savings will be made, but we know from experience—or, rather, we can guess—the probable amount of the gross savings.

Senator MILLEN.—There is a further advantage in putting in the full amount—that we know what the total cost will be.

Senator PLAYFORD. — There is that advantage also in showing the total cost, because, if we do not spend all the money this year, it will come up in the following year as a re-vote.

Senator MATHESON.—It is not proposed to spend anything on mounting 8-inch breech-loading guns on the Cerberus, and yet £2,000 is included in the schedule for that purpose.

Senator PLAYFORD. — If the honorable senator will restrain his impatience, I will come to that item a little further on. I wish to make an explanation in connexion with the vote for special defence material. I do not intend to make any general speech in regard to defence questions as a whole, but I trust that I shall be able to state briefly to the Senate, when the general Estimates come forward, the policy of the Government in respect of the defence of the country, showing exactly the position in which we stand, and what we consider necessary to be done in regard to guns, ammunition, and so forth. At the present time I need not go into these details, except so far as is necessary to explain matters connected with this Bill. Honorable senators will perhaps remember that in 1903-4 a statement was laid before Parliament in which an expenditure was proposed of some £524,683, to be distributed over four years, for warlike stores to place our land forces on a war footing. In 1903-4, we spent £96,000, and in 1904-5, £169,000 was voted, of which we spent only £138,000. We are now providing for the year 1905-6 a sum of £154,000. The vote of £24,000 for two 7·5 guns and ammunition is for the Fremantle fort in Western Australia. With the expenditure of £154,000 this year, there will be left a balance of £135,000 in round figures to be voted next year. When I took office the Estimates had to be laid upon the table within a very short time. I went very carefully through the proposals contained in them with regard to the expenditure on the ordinary Military Forces for the year, but I did not see the details of this special proposed expenditure. I went through the items and cut down the expenditure somewhat, but not so as to destroy efficiency. I was in a better position to do so than the late Minister of Defence was, because I had an opportunity not only of seeing what was proposed for the year, but also what was expended in the previous year. I could, therefore, form an opinion as to where there would be a chance of a saving being made. I cut down the Estimates by £10,000 or £13,000. But, as I have said, I did not see these special items at that time. A sum of £32,500 is set down for accoutrements of one sort and another, such as great coats, straps, and a variety of things that are necessary for military purposes. There is also a sum of £10,000 for saddle-trees, stirrups, and bits; £22,500 for making saddles; £5,653 for medical equipment; £4,000 for tools and miscellaneous materials, and other items. When I came to be Minister of Defence, my attention was called to the fact that we had very little cordite in stock. I noticed that an honorable member of another place asked a question as to how it was that certain guns could not be used by the artillerymen on account of the scarcity of cordite. I made inquiries, and found that we had such a small quantity that we could not afford to fire it away in practice. Consequently, we were not able to give our artillerymen the opportunities for practice that they require. They could have used ordinary black powder, but such practice is not considered so good as is that with the ammunition that would be used in actual warfare.

Senator MATHESON.—The artillerymen are made to use black powder for similar guns at Albany.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We do treat Western Australia rather badly sometimes do we not? No doubt the artillerymen in some places are firing with black powder, and it gives them a certain amount of practice, but it is not desirable to use it more than can be avoided. As I have explained. I found that we were very short of cordite, and were also very short in our number of improved rifles. I came to the conclusion that saddle-trees, saddles, and other accoutrements were not quite so necessary to have in stock as was cordite: because such accoutrements would be put in store ready for time of war, and very possibly would rot before they would be required. The conclusion that I came to was that if war took place, what we should certainly require most was proper arms and ammunition. Such warlike stores, it seemed to me, were of much greater consequence than great coats, saddle-trees, saddles, and waggons. We can commandeer any number of waggons if necessary, and we can make saddles, or can use those we have been using in the past. But we could not do without ammunition, and we could not do without the most improved rifles. In reference to rifles we are in this position. It has been decided by the Council of Defence, on the advice of Major-General Hutton, that on a peace footing we should have something like 25,000 men. We are providing on the general Estimates of the year for something like 23,000 men, which is very close to the number considered desirable. On a war footing we are supposed to have 39,000 men. We must also arm them with the most improved rifles. The weapon with which our service is armed is the Lee-Enfield magazine rifle. I have a statement here showing that we have something like 4,000 more rifles than are absolutely necessary to arm our forces on a peace footing. Of course our artillery and some other members of the forces do not require to be armed with rifles. In addition we have about 30,000 men belonging to rifle clubs who are armed with Martini-Enfield rifles. The Martini-Enfield is a single-loader, and although it is a most excellent arm, it is not so good as a magazine rifle, which contains ten cartridges, that a man can fire very quickly. In actual war, as honorable senators can well imagine, troops armed with single loaders are placed at a great disadvantage when engaged against troops armed with magazine rifles, and the moral effect of having an inferior weapon must be considered. Therefore we ought to get the most improved rifles to arm our forces at their full strength. I do not say that we can attain that object at once, but we should vote for the purpose so much money every year until all our men are armed with magazine rifles. We can already arm in that way our troops on a peace footing; but our reserve-list contains a large number of elderly men who are, perhaps, not as fit as they once were. It is necessary, however, to arm them also.

Senator DOBSON.—We are told by the Colonial Council of Defence that we ought to have 50 per cent. more rifles than men.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am in possession of the statement made by the Colonial Council of Defence.

Senator MATHESON.—At what date—1901?

Senator PLAYFORD.—It was either 1901 or 1902, and the statement was that the States, as they then were, ought to possess sufficient up-to-date rifles to keep the whole of the forces, and the whole of the reserves, up to war strength, with 50 per cent. in addition. When I saw that statement, I at once came to the conclusion that the expenditure on accoutrements, saddle-trees, the making of saddles, camp equipment, medical equipment, and so forth might be reduced, and attention devoted to what is absolutely required in case of war.

Senator GRAY.—No provision is made for the 50 per cent. extra recommended by the Colonial Council of Defence.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No, nor will there be for a long time to come.

Senator GRAY.—Why?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Because we have not the money, and I do not think we should be justified in undertaking the expenditure.

Senator GRAY.—I think it would be very well spent money.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In my opinion, it would be better to gradually increase the number of rifles and the arms we require for defence purposes year by year, as we have done in the past, spending just what money we can afford. Of course, I know that it has been advocated by the ex-Minister of Defence, Mr. McCay, that the Commonwealth should borrow £800,000 in order to obtain accoutrements, arms and ammunition, big guns for the forts, and so forth, and to keep the forces up to war strength. I have, however, had a statement prepared by the officers of the Department, who informed me that it would cost over £1,000,000 to carry out the idea of the ex-Minister. When I address the Senate on the whole question of defence, I shall go into the details of all these matters.

Senator BEST.—What up-to-date rifles have we at the present time?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Some 35,000.

Senator BEST.—Is provision made for any additional rifles?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No. I propose that, instead of expending so much, as is proposed, for saddles, accoutrements, and so forth, we should devote the money to other more useful purposes.

Senator MATHESON.—Will the Minister of Defence move an amendment to that effect?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Not at the present time, because I am not in a position to say exactly how these appropriations should be altered. Following the example of the Prime Minister in another place, I ask the Senate to allow the appropriations to stand. When the Council of Defence has decided as to what alterations of the items are desirable, I shall cause a statement to be laid upon the table of both Chambers, so that the fullest information and opportunity for discussion may be afforded.

Senator BEST.—There will have to be a new Bill.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Not necessarily.

Senator BEST.—But these moneys are now being appropriated for the special purposes set down.

Senator MATHESON.—It is a bad system on which the Minister proposes to act.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is quite common for Ministers to deduct so much from one item, and make an addition to some other item.

Senator MATHESON.—That system was the curse of Western Australia.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It may be considered a bad practice, but it is commonly followed. The Government do not propose to take any action behind the scenes, but to lay before Parliament a full statement of how it is proposed to spend the money.

Senator BEST.—Not after the money has been spent, I hope?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No, before a half-penny is spent.

Senator DOBSON.—Why not embody the new proposals in the Bill next week?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I have not yet the information, and I cannot obtain it in a moment.

Senator DOBSON.—The officers of the Department ought to be able to obtain the information for the Minister.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They cannot do so at a moment's notice.

Senator DOBSON.—It is not a moment's notice.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not think it could be done on a notice of a week or two. I called a meeting of the Council of Defence to consider the question, and the following is an account of what took place:—

At a meeting of the Council of Defence, held on the 24th August, 1905, it was decided that the Chief of Intelligence should confer with the Chief of Ordnance, and submit proposals for a variation of certain items included in the Estimates for 1905-6, as laid before Parliament, viz., in division No. 6, subdivision No. 1, "Special Defence Material," to make provision for the supply of 5,000 rifles and £10,000 worth of cordite charges for guns.

Senator DOBSON.—And to reduce other items.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Yes.

Senator DOBSON.—Those proposals ought to be here before the Bill is passed.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Another place has consented to the arrangement I suggest, and surely honorable senators are able to trust the Government?

Senator DOBSON.—What is the good of the Council of Defence? They had these Estimates before them for weeks.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They had the Estimates before them only on the 24th August, and, as the officers mentioned have not reported to me, I am unable to call another meeting of the Council of Defence.

Senator DOBSON.—Surely that could be done within a week?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not know that it could; at any rate, it has not been done up to the present.

Senator MATHESON.—Colonel Bridges is away, so that there cannot be a meeting.

Senator PLAYFORD.—One or two of the officers are away, and it is impossible for me to get the information. I intend to preserve to Parliament all the powers which are necessary in a matter of this sort. I cannot at present indicate the exact variations which I shall propose, because I have no special knowledge, and must trust to officers who have. It is not proposed to decrease or increase these items by a single pound in the lump, but merely to vary them, and, as I say, a statement will be laid before Parliament giving full details of the proposed expenditure.

Senator DOBSON.—Could not the officers of the Department prepare the information by next Wednesday, and show whether £10,000, £20,000, or £30,000 can be struck off the proposed expenditure on accoutrements and so forth?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not intend that any proposed expenditure shall be struck off until I know exactly how I shall spend the money in other directions; and I cannot come to a decision without consulting the Chief of Ordnance and the Chief of Intelligence. When I get their report I shall call a meeting of the Council of Defence, and ascertain what they propose.

Senator BEST.—Is it not stultifying Parliament to pass items for particular purposes, when the Minister tells us that the money will not be spent for those purposes?

Senator PLAYFORD.—There will be no stultification.

Senator DOBSON.—The Minister used to laugh at the idea of buying great coats when we wanted ammunition and rifles, and yet that apparently is what the Minister himself purposes to do now.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am not going to do anything of the sort.

Senator DOBSON.—We are being asked to vote for certain expenditure, which we are told will not be undertaken.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In one sense that is so, but it is under the most straightforward circumstances, and I again point out that the other branch of the Legislature did not raise the slightest objection. One line in the Estimates, for which I am not responsible, makes provision for mounting 8-inch breech-loading guns on the Cerberus. That item appeared in the Estimates of my predecessor.

Senator DOBSON.—But the present Minister is responsible for it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Perhaps I am in one sense, though I did not know the item was in existence. At any rate, it is not proposed to mount those guns. It was intended that the Cerberus should be thoroughly overhauled, and converted into something like a decent fighting ship; but a careful survey showed that the vessel was beyond repair, and Captain Creswell thinks that she will have to be condemned and thrown to the scrap-heap. The gyroscopes are wanted for the torpedoes, and the service of shell is also necessary; and the total amount for special defence material is £140,000.

Senator GUTHRIE.—What is a gyroscope?

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is an apparatus placed inside a torpedo so that if the torpedo defects in any way, it is at once brought into a straight line.

Senator DOBSON.—Can the Minister tell us the reason why the expenditure on public works generally is now debited per capita instead of to the individual States?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No; I am not responsible for that arrangement.

Senator DOBSON.—But the honorable gentleman is responsible.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That arrangement was made by the late Government at the instance, I believe, of the then Treasurer, Sir George Turner. I do not know when or why it was made, and I am not at the present moment prepared to argue whether it is right and proper or otherwise.

Senator DOBSON.—What is proposed to be done in respect of the money charged, not per capita, but to the individual States during the first year or two?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I think that, all along, defence works have been charged per capita.

Senator DOBSON.—All public works were charged to the individual States previously. The alteration was made last year.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am not responsible for the arrangement, and it is a matter which I have not looked into. But I have no doubt Sir George Turner had very good reasons for the action he took. It is true that one or two of the States may suffer, and be able to offer good reasons why the arrangement should not be continued. However, the arrangement has been agreed to, and I do not know that any alteration can be made.

Debate (on motion by Senator PULSFORD) adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

RUSSO-JAPANESE TREATY OF PEACE—
PUBLIC SERVICE CLASSIFICATION.

Motion (by Senator PLAYFORD) proposed—

That the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales).—I wish to ask the Minister of Defence whether he has any intimation to make to the Senate with regard to the treaty of peace proposed between Russia and Japan. We have so far heard nothing officially as to the conclusion of peace between these countries.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—Any official communication on the subject would, of course, be sent to the Prime Minister. I have no official information on the subject.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—In view of the explicit promise given to the Senate that the fullest possible opportunity would be afforded to senators to discuss the Public Service classification scheme, and in view of possible loss arising under the scheme I should like to ask the honorary Minister when he proposes to redeem the promise given?

Senator KEATING (Tasmania—Honorary Minister).—Some little time ago a Friday sitting was set aside for the discussion of the scheme by the Senate. At the conclusion of the day's sitting it appeared that there were one or two honorable senators who had not had an opportunity to take part in the discussion of the scheme. I then stated that it was not the desire of the Government to block discussion of the matter, but that we were prepared to hear any discussion considered necessary, and to see that any representations made touching the policy and principle of the Act and the classification scheme would receive proper recognition. Subsequently, owing to an honorable senator having placed a notice of motion on the business-paper, I was prevented from in any way affording an opportunity for further discussion. The motion to which I refer was to have been discussed to-day, and I understand it has been postponed.

The PRESIDENT.—It has dropped off the paper, but notice of motion No. 4, dealing with the transference of officers from the clerical to the general division still remains on the paper.

Senator KEATING.—That also touches the question of the Public Service classification. I can say this at present: That should the Appropriation (Works and Buildings) Bill be disposed of to-morrow, no further Government business will be taken, and on the motion for the adjournment of the Senate, any honorable senator who has not already addressed himself to the classification scheme may take advantage of that motion to do so.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—No motion on the subject can then be proposed.

Senator KEATING.—No, the discussion will be taken in the same way as the previous discussion on the subject.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Senate adjourned at 9.33 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 14 September, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. SPEAKER laid on the table revised Standing Orders recommended by the Standing Orders Committee.

PAPERS.

Mr. DEAKIN laid upon the table the following paper:—

Pursuant to the Defence Acts 1903 and 1904—Regulation amended—Financial and Allowance regulations, Part II., sub-paragraph b, paragraph 60—Pay of Permanent Forces—Royal Australian Artillery—Married Establishment—Statutory Rules 1905, No. 54.

The CLERK laid upon the table—

Return to an Order of the House, dated 7th September, 1905, as to the effect of the Sea Carriage of Goods Act on trade with the East.

TASMANIAN DEFENCE.

Mr. STORRER asked the Minister representing the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

Whether he has seen in the press statements by the Premier of Tasmania—

1. That Tasmania was paying three times more for defence now than before Federation?
2. That Tasmania was now ten times worse off than before Federation, Hobart practically being without volunteers?

If so, will he make inquiries into the matter, and, if the statements are correct, will the Government take steps to improve the defence of Hobart?

Mr. DEAKIN.—In reply to the honorable member's question, I have to state—

Yes; but the statements are not correct, as the following figures will show:—Expenditure, 1900-1, £31,471, of which £4,788 was for Naval Agreement; expenditure, 1904-5, £39,007, of which £6,670 was for Naval Agreement; estimates, 1905-6, £43,262, of which £8,946 is for Naval Agreement. Provision is made on the Estimates for the re-organisation of the troops from the 1st January next.

The honorable member will thus see that the statements "that Tasmania was paying three times more for defence" and "was now ten times worse off" are poetic expressions.

AUSTRALIAN SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. Is he aware that there exists an Australian School Geography which has been compiled under the supervision of responsible representatives of the different States?

2. If such geography be shown to him, and on examination be approved, will he consider the propriety of distributing the work amongst the schools of Great Britain?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follows:—

1. Yes.
2. Yes, in connexion with the issue of similar publications as part of a general scheme.

CONTRACT POST-OFFICES.

Motion (by Mr. MAUGER) agreed to—

That a return be laid on the Table of the House showing—

1. The number and situation of "contract" post and telegraph offices.
2. The amount of each contract.
3. The number of employes in each such "contract" office.
4. The wages paid and hours worked by each employé.
5. Particulars as to the employment of members of the contractor's family.

REMUNERATION OF MINISTERS AND MEMBERS.

Motion (by Mr. BRUCE SMITH) negatived—

That notice of motion, No. 1, General Business, be made an order of the day for October 19.

TRADE, COMMERCE, AND INDUSTRIES COMMITTEE.

Mr. SPEAKER.—On the last occasion on which the Order of the Day, No. 1, for the appointment of a Standing Parliamentary Committee of Trade, Commerce, and Industries, came before the House, my attention was called to the fact that the motion stood in the name of the Attorney-General, who was a member of the Government, and that, therefore, it could not be dealt with during the time set apart for the transaction of other than Government business. I would, therefore, suggest that the Order of the Day should be postponed until some day set apart for Government business.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—The Attorney-General desires to withdraw his notice of motion for the present. The Government are considering the whole question, with a view to altering the terms of the motion so that the proposed Committee shall not interfere unduly with the functions of Ministers. I move—

That the Order of the Day be read and discharged.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

DEFENCE ACTS REGULATIONS.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I move—

That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the advisability of amending the Regulations issued under the Defence Acts; the Committee to consist of Mr. Batchelor, Mr. Hutchison, Mr. Maloney, Mr. Mauger, Mr. Page, Mr. Wilks, and the mover, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to sit at any time.

I desire to bring under notice several matters of importance to members of the Defence Force, and particularly to some of my constituents, with regard to certain defence regulations, which seem to me to be contrary to the spirit of the Defence Act, and to involve gross injustice. The regulations which are the subject of complaint do not give effect to the clearly expressed desire of honorable members, as embodied in the Defence Act, but, on the other hand, interfere with the freedom of the men, and deny them those opportunities of preferment which it was intended they should be granted. In the first place, I wish to direct attention to section 11 of the Defence Act of 1903, which reads as follows:—

In the first appointment of officers, preference shall be given, in the case of equality of qualifications, to persons who have served in the Defence Force for three years without a commission.

At the time that section was under discussion—and I am proud to say that it was inserted on my motion—a desire was expressed by honorable members that opportunities should be given to men serving in the ranks to rise to higher positions in the service. The intention was that the members of our Defence Forces should have opportunities similar to those which are offered to men in the French Army, in which it is said that every private carries a marshal's baton in his knapsack, in the South African Police Force, where every man has to serve fifteen years in the ranks before he can obtain a commission, and in the military service of every democratic community, in which the right is conceded to every man who shows himself possessed of the necessary ability to rise to the highest positions. I am sorry to say that the regulations under the Defence Act have been framed in such a way as to very largely deny to the men the privileges which it was intended they should enjoy. Regulation 13 provides—

A candidate will not be eligible for appointment on probation unless he is between the ages of nineteen and twenty-three. Candidates who have served during the campaigns of South Africa or China will be eligible up to the age of twenty-five years. Candidates over the age of twenty-three years who have previously been permanently employed in military service, or in military engineering, will be considered on their merits, in accordance with the length of their previous military service, and the experience they have gained.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Is the honorable and learned member reading from the existing regulations?

Mr. CROUCH.—Yes. The Minister of Defence was good enough to furnish me with a copy of the proposed new regulations, from which it appears that none of the regulations to which I propose to refer have been altered in any material sense. Therefore I cannot be met with the statement that the objections now urged have been overcome. The second regulation to which I object reads—

A successful candidate will be appointed for six months on probation, and must, during the period of probation, pass a qualifying examination in military subjects. The appointment of any candidate who fails to pass will not be confirmed. Under very special circumstances the term of probation may be extended, on the recommendation of the General Officer Commanding, for a period not exceeding three months.

I wish now to refer honorable members to the instructions which appear upon page 247, and which show the sort of examination that those who serve in the ranks of the Permanent Forces are expected to pass. A man who joins at the minimum age of twenty years is required to serve for three years before he can take advantage of this provision. Further, it is only open to men up to twenty-three years of age. After having served three years they are required to pass an examination in arithmetic, Euclid, algebra, Latin, French or German, the examination being limited to translations from the language, grammatical questions and easy compositions, writing English correctly and in a good legible hand from dictation, the elements of geometrical drawing, and geography. In addition to the foregoing it is set out that candidates will be required to qualify, and if there are more candidates than vacancies to compete in the following subjects:—Plane trigonometry, mensuration of simple surfaces and solids, elementary hydrostatics and mechanics, and the use of logarithms. I have here a copy of the examination paper which was set for candidates during the period that the late Minister of Defence held office.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable and learned member does not suppose that the Minister has anything to do with the setting of the examination papers?

Mr. CROUCH.—I presume that he is not altogether irresponsible for the work of his officers. At any rate, I thought that the Minister would have known the nature of this examination paper, because of a communication which I forwarded to him in reference to a man named Watts. Under the circumstances I naturally supposed that he would have made himself acquainted with the details of the paper. Although I might have been able, upon leaving school, to answer the questions set in the examination paper to which I refer, I certainly could not do so now, and no man who has been three years soldiering could reasonably be expected to work out the arithmetic paper, for example. There was a time when I could have got through the examination papers so far as French is concerned. In that connexion I may be pardoned for mentioning that when I matriculated at the Melbourne University I obtained honours in French.

Mr. McCAY.—That is not saying very much.

Mr. CROUCH.—At any rate, it shows the standard that is being set. I never knew much about geometrical drawing, which is one of the subjects in which candidates are examined. The task set them in algebra was, in my opinion, pretty stiff, and the same remark is applicable to the Latin paper. I cannot say whether or not the papers relating to hydrostatics, statics, and mensuration were difficult. Certainly the examination to which I refer is quite equal to a very stiff matriculation pass.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But the honorable and learned member is an officer himself, and he must have passed this sort of examination.

Mr. CROUCH.—No, I am a militia officer. I am very glad that the Prime Minister has made that interjection, because any candidate for the instructional and administrative staff has merely to pass an easy examination in these subjects. Latin, French, mensuration, trigonometry, and algebra all disappear in the examination for a commission upon the instructional or administrative staff, which we regard as a more important branch of the service.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is only the artillerymen who require this training.

Mr. CROUCH.—Yes. The artillerymen are subjected to this stiff examination, despite the fact that they do not meet the enemy at close quarters, but engage him at a distance possibly of ten miles. These are the men who should not require to be possessed of a knowledge of languages at all. Under certain circumstances, I can understand that modern languages are useful, and frequently an acquaintance with Latin may be of service, inasmuch as it constitutes the base of Spanish, Italian, and other modern tongues. If a knowledge of all these subjects is required by anybody it is by the instructional and administrative staff, and not by the Garrison Artillery, whose members constitute our second line of sea defence. But in spite of the severity of this examination, there was one man who was ready to tackle it. He was one of a number of young men of good birth who are without means, and who join the ranks of the permanent forces. This individual was Corporal Watts. When he volunteered for service in South Africa he was deemed good enough to be appointed an officer. Concerning him Colonel Kelly, under whom he served for over twelve months there, said, "He is a good soldier, and I recommend him for a commission."

Mr. FISHER.—Did he not receive one?

Mr. CROUCH.—He was not even allowed to submit himself for examination, despite the fact that he was given a commission in South Africa in the corps of the Fourth Contingent, which was commanded by Colonel Kelly. Corporal, then Lieutenant Watts, was a mounted infantry officer, who was engaged in the fighting line, and who came back to Australia with clasps and medals in recognition of his services. Before he first joined the Permanent Artillery he served two years and eight months in the Militia Garrison Artillery. He was absent in South Africa for two years and one month, and upon his return he endeavoured to secure his commission in the artillery at Queenscliff.

Mr. McCAY.—When was that?

Mr. CROUCH.—I am not able to give the date, but it was within the past three years. He returned from South Africa in 1903, and the following year he rejoined the Queenscliff Artillery as a gunner. There he secured the highest number of marks scored by members of his school of gunnery. He was one of those who was sent to South Head, Sydney, for special instruction in gunnery, and there his percentage was 82.

Mr. McCAY.—He failed in his examination as a non-commissioned officer.

Mr. CROUCH. — I will refer to that later. Finally he applied to be allowed to submit himself for examination for a commission. A number of the artillerymen say that they do not like to submit themselves to examination in such subjects as French and trigonometry. Corporal Watts, however, declared that he was ready to face it. He was perfectly willing to compete against men who had not had a particle of military experience, but who had successfully matriculated, or who had come from offices or high schools or colleges. There were sixteen civilian applications and one military application. The first official reason for refusing him permission to compete at the examination was that he had unsuccessfully attempted to pass an examination as a non-commissioned officer for a position upon the instructional staff, although he obtained 90 per cent. of marks in all subjects except two, which were not artillery subjects at all. I refer to tactics and map drawing, which have nothing whatever to do with artillery.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable and learned member say that tactics and map drawing have nothing to do with artillerymen? These men, it must be recollected, are instructors to the field artillery.

Mr. CROUCH.—That is an argument which I intend to meet, because neither map reading nor tactics is laid down as a qualification which officers must possess. Corporal Watts endeavoured to obtain an instructorship in the Light Horse, and failed to do so. Is that the only reason which the Minister can offer as to why this man was not allowed to compete at the examination? It seems to me that such a statement will not hold water for a moment. I can point to one officer in the Royal Australian Artillery who failed in his examination the first time, and to another who had to submit himself for examination three times. I will read the letter which was forwarded to me by the honorable and learned member for Corinella during the period that he filled the office of Minister of Defence, in regard to the case of Corporal Watts. It is as follows:—

Melbourne, 29th June, 1905.

Dear Sir,

1. I have now had an opportunity of again looking into the papers relating to the application of Bombardier Watts, R.A.A., to be examined for a commission in that corps.

2. You are mistaken in supposing that his having served in the ranks has been the ground on which he was not approved as a candidate for examination.

3. There were, in all, seventeen applicants for permission to compete for the vacancies now existing in the R.A.A.

4. Each applicant was reported upon by a special Board, and by the Commandant of the State in which he was residing.

5. The whole of the applications were then considered by the Military Board, who concurred in the prior recommendation in every case except one, where they sanctioned an applicant's competing at the examination.

6. Only seven in all were authorized, and those who were not authorized comprised both members of the Forces and those without military training.

7. Bombardier Watts unsuccessfully attempted to qualify for the Instructional Staff of non-commissioned officers, and for that, as well as for other reasons of the same character as were applied in the case of other applicants, his competing was not approved.

8. Bombardier Watts does not come within the conditions of preference laid down by section 11 of the Defence Act.

This man, who served many more than three years in the ranks, and nine months as an officer, and twelve months as a regimental sergeant-major, does not, it is contended, come within the terms of preference. But there are other reasons given for the treatment which has been meted out to him. Each applicant was reported upon by a special board and by the Commandant of the State in which he was residing. I wish to show what was the nature of that report. On the 8th March last, Colonel Ricardo, the Commandant of his own State, recommended this gentleman—I use the word “gentleman” advisedly, for I know Watts well—for favorable consideration. The official papers set forth that Colonel Ricardo reported, on the date named, that his application for a commission in the Royal Australian Artillery is “recommended for favorable consideration.” Watts, who was selected as one of the best men that Queenscliff could turn out, attended the school of gunnery, and, subsequently, his application was sent on to Brigadier-General Gordon—who had an Australian defence scheme “up his sleeve”—and Colonel Stanley. It is not my desire to read all the papers on the file. It is sufficient for me to say that Watts was recommended by his commanding officer, his State Commandant, and, indeed, by every officer over him. His application was eventually submitted to a special board, consisting of Brigadier-General Gordon, Colonel Stanley, and another officer, who was not present, and Watts was requested to attend before that body. One of the questions put to him was as to his means.

Mr. MCCAY.—That does not appear in the official papers.

Mr. CROUCH.—It does not; but I know what questions were put to the man. He was asked what his father did, what his mother was before she married, to whom were his sisters married, what position in life did his brothers-in-law occupy, and what occupation was followed by his brothers. These and other questions were put to the man, and, finally, the board reported, amongst other things, that he was not captain of his school, and that he was “over-confident.”

Mr. WEBSTER.—Is that a fault in a soldier?

Mr. CROUCH.—A factor in the success of many men in the South African war was their readiness as soldiers to accept responsibility. The official papers show that the board reported that they had not a favorable opinion of his force of character. When this report was sent back to the Military Board, Colonel Hoad, a member of that body, who has risen from the ranks, said that he thought it advisable to refer the papers once more to Colonel Ricardo, and that officer—notwithstanding that on the 8th March, 1905, he had recommended Watts' application for favorable consideration—reported on the 16th May, 1905, “I cannot recommend him.” The man then wrote to me. I have to mention this, in order to explain how I came into possession of the facts, and I am sure that the House will be prepared to defend him for having committed a gross breach of the regulations in writing to me. It was his only hope. It was a question of the whole of his future to him. As the result of representations made for him, I wrote to the Minister of Defence, and received a reply which illustrates what may be done under regulations that are supposed to give men in the ranks an opportunity to rise. If any man in the ranks has shown ability, that man is Watts. He has been at the top of every class and school of gunnery that he has attended, and can show a splendid “arm.”

He has badges for flag signalling, first-class gunnery, and other services, and yet he has been denied the opportunity to submit himself for examination for a commission. His brother-in-law may have been working in a laundry, for all I know, as I did not inquire—his sisters are married to I do not know whom—but at any rate his family connexions, good as I know them to be, apparently did not suit Brigadier-General Gordon and Colonel Stanley, who was himself a gunner in the R.A.A. They desired a more aristocratic régime in the Defence Forces, and consequently this man was denied the right to submit himself for examination. It was thought, possibly, that if he passed the necessary examination he might contaminate other officers. Apparently considerations of social position are taken into account in connexion with applications on the part of men wishing to be examined for commissions. This is an abomination and an outrage, and it ought to be inquired into. Ultimately, Watts paraded before Brigadier-General Gordon, who was unaware that I had seen the official papers, and was told by him that he had been rejected because he had not attended an advanced school. That was the explanation which Brigadier-General Gordon offered, although it was quite different from that furnished in his official report.

Mr. TUDOR.—What did Brigadier-General Gordon mean by that?

Mr. CROUCH.—I suppose the trouble was that the man had attended a State instead of a Grammar School. My desire is that the regulations should be amended, and I have simply referred to this case as an illustration of what is permitted under them. I hold that the regulations must be defective unless they declare that every man who desires to submit himself for examination on acquiring a certain military proficiency shall be allowed to do so.

Mr. PAGE.—And no matter whose shirts his mother may wash.

Mr. CROUCH.—I would not like the House to think that his mother is a laundress—as a matter of fact, I am told that she comes of a very respectable family—but I do say that a man should be allowed to submit himself for examination no matter what position in life his parents may occupy.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There was no age disqualification?

Mr. CROUCH.—No.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Then would not the man come under the regulation relating to—

Warrant officers, non-commissioned officers, and men who have served for three years in the Defence Force, provided that they are between the ages of nineteen and twenty-five at the date of holding the educational examination.

Mr. CROUCH.—Yes.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is a new regulation.

Mr. CROUCH.—The point is that he has not been allowed to go up for examination.

Mr. McCAY.—The regulations have been completely altered and special boards are now abolished.

Mr. CROUCH.—I have read the new regulation.

Mr. BAMFORD.—At all events it has not been assigned as a reason for the refusal that the man does not come under this regulation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Quite so; but I wish to know whether he would not be allowed, under the regulation I have quoted, to go up for examination at the present time.

Mr. CROUCH.—He ought to be allowed to do so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Under another regulation a man who has served in a campaign may also go up for examination. It seems that Watts would be eligible under two of the new regulations.

Mr. CROUCH.—That seems to be so, but the point is that he has not been permitted to go up for examination.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The special board stopped him?

Mr. CROUCH.—It did.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But special boards are now abolished. Does not that afford the man relief?

Mr. CROUCH.—It certainly helps his position, but I am not satisfied with the regulations as amended. In the case under notice we have a man who has served three years, and that fact should be taken into consideration. Why should I, simply because I have just passed the matriculation examination, be allowed a preference over a man who has not matriculated, but has spent three years in making himself proficient in practical military work? Practical work does not count, although it reduces one's ability to pass in purely literary subjects. One of my objections to the new scheme is that under it a candidate has first to pass a qualifying literary examination. If, say, three men passed that examination, they would be sent to Queenscliff or South Head for six months, and during that time would be crammed, perhaps, by the very men whom they had defeated at the literary examination, and through their agency would acquire the information necessary to enable them to pass the artillery examination. I certainly do not think that we should have illiterate officers, but I hold that professional military qualifications should be considered at the first examination equally with the literary qualification.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That seems to be reasonable.

Mr. CROUCH.—No provision is made for it. My second objection relates to the qualification as to age.

Mr. DEAKIN.—But campaign service is a qualification.

Mr. CROUCH.—It must be recognised that campaign service does not assist a man to pass in literary subjects. A soldier does not usually take a book on trigonometry with him when he is starting on a campaign. I repeat that professional qualifications should be considered equal to literary qualifications. With regard to the regulations in respect to the age limit, I would point out that if a man enters the permanent service at the age of twenty, a service of three years leaves him a very small margin of time before his arrival at the age of twenty-five years.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He still has two years.

Mr. CROUCH.—Yes; but some allowance must be made for youthfulness. A man at that age often does not pay regard to the future needs of his vocation. But why should a soldier, who for three years has been doing additional artillery service, and acquiring additional qualifications, be blocked from further promotion by an age qualification? Section 11 of the Act says "Any man who has served three years in the ranks." Therefore, I doubt the legality of this regulation. Another matter to which I wish to draw attention is the regulations affecting a soldier's right to appeal. At the present time, a man who is aggrieved, parades his commanding officer, as it is called; but he has no right to send on his complaint, in writing, in his own language, to the District Commandant. I do not wish to refer to the case of the man Sheehan, but the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who dealt with that case, knows that the papers did not disclose the complaint which the man afterwards said he had made. He said that he had complained of certain things, but an altogether different case was put before the District Commandant. The men are given the right of appeal, but they must put their cases verbally before their commanding officers, and he sends along whatever form of appeal he likes to frame.

Mr. McCAY.—If that is done, it is due to a misinterpretation of the existing regulations. Every soldier has the right to have his complaints forwarded.

Mr. CROUCH.—But my point is that if he is a permanent soldier, he cannot have his complaints forwarded in writing. He says, "I want to see the company commanding officer." He parades that officer, and makes his complaint. It can then go to the commanding officer of the battery, if he says, "I am dissatisfied with your decision, sir"; but he is not allowed to put in a written appeal.

Mr. PAGE.—Does he not see the State Commandant himself?

Mr. CROUCH.—In some instances he is sent to the out forts when the time for seeing the State Commandant comes.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable and learned member is now making, not a complaint about the regulations, but a charge of maladministration against officers, which is quite another matter.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am complaining of the regulations, which will not allow the men to appeal in writing. I will tell the House of a case in point. The facts relate to a man who is not now in the artillery. If it were otherwise, I should not have been able to get them. A bombardier named Webb, an ex-chemist, was, one day, about six months ago, looking at the notice-board in the barracks. Colonel Le Mesurier and Major Hawker passed, when Webb was reading the notices, and the proper thing for him to do, according to the regulations, was to come to attention as smartly as he could, and salute. As he did not salute, Colonel Le Mesurier called the attention of Major Hawker to the fact.

Mr. PAGE.—Although Webb had his back to them?

Mr. CROUCH.—Yes. Major Hawker went up and tapped Webb smartly on the back with a stick. Webb turned round and saluted. "Why did you not salute before?" he was asked. "I did not see you, sir; I was reading the notices," he replied. "You did see us. Report yourself to the sergeant-major, and he will bring you up to me at the office in the morning." He was brought up to the office next morning, and again told his commanding officer that he had not seen him. He is a man who had a clean record, and enjoyed the privilege of living out of the barracks. When the incident occurred, his wife was within about five days of being confined. But, notwithstanding this, and the excuse he had given, he was punished by being compelled to live within the barracks; he had his bombardier's stripe removed; and he lost a job which meant extra pay. He desired, first of all, to appeal to the State Commandant, but was told that, if he did so, he would be sent to the out forts, and would not see his wife at all, and it was of so much importance to him that he should see his wife that he withdrew his appeal.

Mr. McCAY.—Surely this is an ex parte statement which the honorable and learned member is now making, and has nothing to do with the regulations.

Mr. CROUCH.—It shows the need for a regulation to meet the case. It is an ex parte statement; but, before venturing to bring it before the House, I made inquiries from several men on whom I can rely, and, if a Select Committee be appointed, it will be found that the facts are absolutely as I am stating them. Webb also asked to be allowed to appeal to the Minister, and was told by Major Hawker that if he did so he would be sent to the out forts, and, again, because he had a sick wife, he withdrew his appeal. Having obtained information about this case from others, I wrote to Webb for his account of the matter, and he sent me the following letter:—

Queenscliff,
August 27, 1905.

Dear Sir,

The following is a true statement of my case:—

On the 14th of April I was made a prisoner for inattention to orders, my crime being neglecting to salute Colonel Le Mesurier. On the following day (although it was not denied by the evidence on either side that my offence was purely accidental) I was for this crime reverted by Major Hawker to the rank of gunner. In addition to this punishment, I was deprived of the privilege of wearing plain clothes, and allowed no leave for a month. The privilege of living out of barracks, which had been granted me by the R.D.O. the previous week, was also taken from me as part of my punishment, and I was compelled to break up my home and send my wife home to her mother, and come into barracks for an indefinite period. I was also returned to duty, having been employed as assistant linesman for about eight months, and under promise from Colonel Wallace that as soon as the Estimates were passed I would be appointed permanent linesman, with special duty pay at 2s. per diem.

I also wish to add that on parading Major Hawker and stating my intention to appeal to the Commandant against his decision in my case, I was warned by him that he "could make things very rough for me," and that, in the event of my persisting in making an appeal, he "could transfer me to another company, and send me to South Channel."

I asked to be paraded before the Commandant that I might state my complaint, but was not allowed to see him; instead, Major Hawker forwarded my appeal, written by himself—presumably to suit himself—and of course I received no satisfaction. I asked to be paraded before the Minister of Defence, but Major Hawker and Captain Christian, with a little bluff, persuaded me to withdraw the case, pointing out that I was only driving my head at a brick wall, and that I was getting myself into serious trouble, and that I was killing the proverbial goose, &c., giving me the impression that if I withdrew the case I would get my privileges back. I paraded several times for them for three months, but was met with a refusal each time, so I applied for my discharge, and it was granted. The above is rather a rambling report, but I think you will be able to follow it. Regretting to have taken up so much of your time, I remain, yours truly,

THOS. J. WEBB.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—What Minister allowed this persecution?

Mr. CROUCH.—I do not think the Minister knew anything about the matter. Webb took his discharge, because he could not bear to be kept away from his wife, and his child was born in his absence from home.

Mr. WEBSTER.—This is a grave charge against the officers.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes, and if it be proved, they should be punished. But it has nothing to do with the regulations.

Mr. CROUCH.—There are certain men in Queenscliff on whom I can rely for getting accurate information, and having inquired of them, I have no hesitation in saying that the statements I have made are absolutely correct. The man could not get his appeal sent forward; he could not make it in writing.

Mr. McCAY.—Under the regulations men have the right to appeal in writing.

Mr. CROUCH.—If the honorable and learned member will tell me under which of the regulations that right is given, I will read it to the House; but there is no such regulation.

Mr. McCAY.—Regulations part V., paragraph 2. It is not stated that the appeal may be made in writing, but if the honorable and learned member reads the paragraph he will see that obviously it may be made in writing. The soldier may make any representation he chooses.

Mr. CROUCH.—The regulation in question is as follows:—

If any soldier thinks himself wronged in any matter by any officer, other than his captain, or by any soldier, he may complain thereof to his captain, and if he thinks himself wronged by his captain, either in respect of his complaint not being redressed, or in respect of any other matter, he may complain thereof to his Commanding Officer, and if he thinks himself wronged by his Commanding Officer, either in respect of his complaint not being redressed, or in respect of any other matter, he may complain thereof to the District Commandant where the soldier is serving; and every officer to whom a complaint is made, in pursuance of this section, shall cause such complaint to be inquired into, and shall, if, on inquiry, he is satisfied of the justice of the complaint so made, take such steps as may be necessary for giving full redress to the complainant in respect of the matter complained of. Such soldier shall have the power, if he so desire, to make representation to the General Officer Commanding, through his Commanding Officer, and, if necessary, through his Commanding Officer and the General Officer Commanding to the Minister.

Mr. McCAY.—To make representations—his own representations.

Mr. CROUCH.—No.

Mr. McCAY.—It must mean that.

Mr. PAGE.—That is what I take it to mean.

Mr. CROUCH.—I say that the men are not allowed to put in written representations. I do not wish to refer to Sheehan's case, because it is a dead case. That man gave me a statement of the complaints he made to his commanding officer, and I put it before the House. He wished to have it forwarded on, but the commanding officer did not forward it.

Mr. PAGE.—That was not the fault of the regulations.

Mr. CROUCH.—It was the fault of the regulations. I wish it to be distinctly provided that a man may put his complaints in writing, and have them forwarded on, and that if they are not forwarded on, the officer neglecting or refusing to forward them shall be deemed guilty of an offence.

Mr. GROOM.—It would be a very serious offence for an officer to refuse to send on a complaint.

Mr. CROUCH.—Honorable members, with the exception of the honorable member for Maranoa, do not know what permanent discipline is. I brought a man to give the honorable member for Melbourne Ports some information about the canteen at Queenscliff; but he had the greatest dread lest I should tell the honorable member his name, because he feared that it might afterwards be inadvertently used. Consequently, all the honorable member knows is that a certain man, who represented himself as coming from Queenscliff, or some other place, saw him, and gave him information about the canteen. He does not know the man's name, and I requested him not to ask his name. Although the soldier in question holds a humble position in the ranks, there are several ways of punishing him, just as there are more ways of killing a cat than by hanging it. A man can be blocked time after time, and if he persists in airing his grievances he is regarded as an agitator, and at the end of his five years' term of service is dismissed as a man who is no longer fit to occupy a place in the ranks. The regulation relating to drunkenness provides that there shall be no punishment for the first offence, but Major Hawker ordered a man, whom I will only call L. M., to be imprisoned for five days in the cells, and to be confined to barracks for ten days, and deprived him of his good conduct badge and the pay attached to it. There is another matter to which I desire to refer. About two years ago the rations issued to the men were decreased by  $\frac{1}{4}$  lb. of bread and  $\frac{1}{4}$  lb. of meat. The Tasmanian and Victorian soldiers have complained that, although  $1\frac{1}{4}$  lbs. of bread may be sufficient for men serving in Queensland, it does not meet the wants of men with more vigorous appetites in the southern States. Even in Queensland the Government insist upon the kanakas receiving 2 lbs. of bread per day.

Mr. PAGE.—In the Imperial service only 1 lb. of bread per diem is allowed.

Mr. CROUCH.—But then the men are allowed jam and other things.

Mr. PAGE.—Only when they are on active service.

Mr. CROUCH.—If an Australian soldier requires jam or milk, he has to buy it, and he is also called upon to pay out of his own pocket for hats and other articles of dress which he is compelled to use on parade. I desire to call attention to the regulations which prevent men from marrying without leave. These regulations should specially appeal to the Prime Minister, who is interested in the question of increasing our population. Regulations 45 and 46 read as follow:—

A Commanding Officer is not to sanction the marriage of a soldier in anticipation of a vacancy. Any soldier who marries without the consent of the Commanding Officer, or was married before enlistment, will be thereby debarred from being placed at any subsequent time on the married establishment without the permission of the District Commandant, which is not to be given unless the conditions given in paragraph 44 are fulfilled, and unless there is an actual vacancy and no qualified applicants for leave to marry exist.

No soldiers are to be allowed permanent passes to sleep out of their quarters, except those (1) who have married with leave, and who, together with their wives, are of good character; and (2) widowers with children, if approved by the Commanding Officer. Such men must be regular in their duties, orderly in their lodgings or quarters, exact in their dress, and never leave their lodgings or quarters after tattoo, except on duty with leave. Any man not obeying these orders is to be brought into barracks.

I object to these regulations, because they treat the men as if they were infants.

Mr. PAGE.—There must be some restriction, for the sake of discipline.

Mr. CROUCH.—I shall show the difference which exists between the conditions in the Imperial and the Australian military services. At one time a regulation in connexion with the Victorian police force provided that members of the force should not marry without leave, but several men married without leave, and that put an end to the regulation. That could not, however, happen in the military service. The regulations I have quoted are copied from the Imperial regulations. There may be some point in enforcing such regulations in the Imperial barracks, where quarters are provided for married men, and, moreover, it is necessary, for the sake of discipline, and also in the interests of morality, that the women who are introduced into barracks should be of good character. In Australia no quarters are provided for married couples, and if a man marries he has to provide for his family outside. On one occasion I had to apply to Colonel Umphelby to permit a man who had married privately to live out of barracks, and to draw his 9d. per day ration money, so that he might contribute that amount toward the expenses of his home. I have known cases in which marriages would have been very desirable for the sake of the women affected. In three instances gunners would have been willing to marry girls whom they had wronged, but they objected to going before their commanding officers to obtain their consent, and they urged that as an excuse for not marrying. This regulation not only involves a sin against society, but also interferes with the rights and liberties of the men as citizens. Colonel Wallace and Colonel Umphelby, and other commanding officers, were not too exacting, but administered the regulations tactfully, and thus inferentially admitted that they were bad. I wish to mention the experience through which a decent girl at Queenscliff was required to pass by the commanding officer at Queenscliff, Major Hawker. Major Hawker introduced a regulation under which it was required that any girl who desired to marry a member of the force should come before him—should be practically paraded before him. A certain gunner who wanted to marry a young lady belonging to a very respectable family, did not like the regulations, and put off his marriage for two months, but eventually the young lady was brought up before Major Hawker, who looked her over as if she were a horse. He did not say anything but what was proper. He asked her whether she was aware that the man whom she wanted to marry was in receipt of only 3s. 6d. per day, and she replied in the affirmative. He said it was all right, so long as she was aware of the fact, because a lot of the men gave it forth that they were sergeant-majors, or something of that kind, and in receipt of from 6s. to 9s. per day. I do not suppose that any further marriages in which members of the Military Forces are concerned will be celebrated until the very foolish regulations to which I have referred are abolished. I think that the whole system should be done away with. Modern military conditions require independence of thought on the part of the men. The success of an army does not depend upon the officers or non-commissioned officers, but upon the ability and resourcefulness of the individual soldier, who is frequently called upon to fight independently of direct control by his officers. There have absolutely been cases in which men have been confined to barracks for shaving without permission. None of the men at Queenscliff are allowed to shave off their moustaches. If they do, they are confined to barracks for from ten to thirty days.

Mr. MCCAY.—That is not according to the regulations.

Mr. CROUCH.—It seems to me that we should have a regulation to provide against any such punishment being inflicted. I am told that on two occasions mutinies have occurred among the men under the command of Major Hawker. In one case, at Sydney, ten men refused to do duty under him.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable and learned member think that it is fair to the officer concerned to repeat all this gossip? I know nothing about the case. What the honorable and learned member says may, or may not, be true, but it is very unfair to repeat gossip of that kind. The honorable and learned member should make a formal charge, and ask for an inquiry. Even his motion does not relate to an inquiry into the conduct of Major Hawker.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable and learned member asks me whether it is fair to repeat gossip, and at the same time admits that my statements may be true. I do not think it fair to repeat gossip, but what I am stating is not gossip. I am relating facts which can be substantiated. I should like the proposed Committee to be appointed, so that the fullest inquiry may be made.

Mr. McCAY.—The Committee could not inquire into allegations such as the honorable and learned member has made with regard to mutiny.

Mr. CROUCH.—Yes, it could. In order to show the honorable and learned member that I am not retailing mere gossip, I would refer him to the official records, which show that in June, 1904, there was a mutiny among the men at Middle Head, Sydney, when nine men refused duty. A man named Dwyer was imprisoned in the cells for fourteen days, and the other eight men were removed from the company under the command of Major Hawker, and distributed among other companies.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member said Major Hawker had a mutiny—implying that he was the cause of it.

Mr. CROUCH.—I venture to say that it is very unfair for the honorable and learned member for Corinella, speaking with the authority of an ex-Minister of Defence, to characterize any statement as gossip unless he can put his finger on it and absolutely prove that it is gossip. If he attempted to do that I should then be able to submit names and dates in support of my assertion, and these would take it out of the region of gossip, and place it in the category of substantiated charges. All these circumstances induce me to believe that the defence regulations require a very great deal of consideration. A number of them affect these men most vitally. I hope that the honorable member for Wentworth will assist me in this matter, because there are some members of the Garrison Artillery in his constituency. At the same time, I have not been prompted to take action by the fact that some of these men are my constituents. I feel that if these circumstances had been brought under the notice of any other honorable member he would have been equally ready to do justice to the persons aggrieved. When I think that it is possible for such injustices to continue under our defence regulations I feel sore at heart. I have many other matters to speak about, but I do not wish to detain the House too long. I claim that the facts which I have brought under the notice of the House merit serious consideration. The Government have been good enough to delay finally dealing with the revised defence regulations until this motion was submitted, in order that they might avoid taking two bites at a cherry. I thank them for their consideration in that respect, and trust that the motion will be carried.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella).—I am indebted to the courtesy of the Prime Minister for the opportunity to say a few words now, as unfortunately I shall be compelled to leave the House shortly, and thus would not otherwise be able to speak at all. I wish to say that if the allegations made by the honorable and learned member for Corio against one officer—and the bulk of his speech was devoted to that matter—are well founded, or even if there is a case for inquiry as regards that officer, I should have no objection to passing this motion. But he has not asked for that at all. The honorable and learned member has asked for a Select Committee to consider defence regulations, and in doing so he has made a number of charges, which constitute a very serious indictment against one of the officers of our Permanent Forces. I regret that he has made those charges in this informal way, and apparently without having ascertained that officer's version of the matters referred to.

Mr. CROUCH.—What about the commissions?

Mr. McCAY.—I am speaking of what constituted the bulk of the honorable and learned member's speech. I wish to say a few words in reference to the case of Corporal Watts, to which he alluded. That case was dealt with under the regulations as they existed. Those regulations were of an entirely unsatisfactory character, and they are now being altered in their essence. If I had remained in office they would have been altered under my control, just as they are being altered under the control of Senator Playford. I did not like the system under which military boards discharged their functions and asked all sorts of unnecessary questions.

Mr. FISHER.—Did they ask the questions to which the honorable and learned member for Corio referred?

Mr. McCAY.—I do not know.

Mr. WATSON.—I have confirmation of his statement in another case.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member for Bland will recollect that in the case to which he refers I did everything that I could to obtain the fullest information for him, and to get at the root of the matter. It was that and other matters which made me dissatisfied with these special military boards as they were then constituted, and with the confidential instructions issued to them—instructions, which were acted upon before I came into office. Indeed, I went so far that, pending the revision of the regulations, I largely modified those instructions. If questions of the character referred to were asked, they were certainly not asked under the instructions as I modified them. They were not the kind of questions which the instructions contemplated. Under the regulations as they stand, an appointment is not possible without the approval of the District Commandant. I did not agree with that provision, and the new regulations do away with it. The Military Board alone, that is, the central authority of which the Minister is a member, can determine whether or not a candidate may compete at an examination under the new regulations. In my opinion, there must be some final power of saying, "We shall not allow X or Y to compete." There are cases in which the mere fact that an officer is willing to compete should not entitle him to do so. There must be some final power of saying whether a candidate may or may not compete at an examination. But when once we have said that he may compete he must take his chance equally with all the others. The case of Corporal Watts went to the Military Board, and then came before me in my capacity as Minister. After the fullest consideration, all the officers concerned declared that they could not recommend him—

Mr. CROUCH.—Colonel Ricardo recommended him.

Mr. McCAY.—Colonel Ricardo recommended him at first, but afterwards withdrew his recommendation. I attach more importance to the opinion of a senior officer than to that of a junior officer.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable and learned gentleman stated just now that all the officers concerned were against Corporal Watts.

Mr. McCAY.—If I did so, I spoke in too large terms. What I intended to convey was that all the officers whose recommendations carry weight according to the regulations—all the senior officers—were against him. Under the old regulations I did not feel justified in overruling all their views in regard to a gentleman of whom, personally, I knew nothing, and did not propose to know anything, except that he had lodged a complaint.

Mr. FISHER.—Were there reasons that excluded him from undergoing the examination other than soldierlike reasons?

Mr. McCAY.—Social reasons had absolutely nothing to do with the matter. Time after time during my term of office, where I suspected that such reasons were operative, I appended to the documents this minute, "Have social reasons had anything to do with this matter?" There were other appointments besides that which Corporal Watts wanted in which I suspected that social reasons might operate. I repeat that, under these circumstances, I did not feel justified in overriding the views expressed by the senior officers. The first regulation of which the honorable and learned member for Corio complains has reference to the age limit. He told the House that that limit was not altered in any material respect in the new regulations. But I would point out that in the former regulations the age limit for joining the Permanent Artillery is twenty years, whereas under the new regulations it has been reduced to eighteen years. Surely that is a material alteration. The age at which a man could become an officer of the Royal Australian Artillery, or of the Instructional Staff, was previously in all cases twenty-five years. Under the new regulations, it has been altered to twenty-five years, as against twenty-three years for civilians. All the matters of which the honorable and learned member complains are being met in the new draft regulations. He also referred to the examination for the Royal Artillery and Engineers. I say, without hesitation, that we must have men of good educational attainments in those branches of the service. His derision of the prescribed examination is not justified. The officers in the Royal Australian Artillery and in the Engineers are not merely garrison officers, but instructors of our Field Forces, and those forces require the best instructors whose services we can command.

Mr. CROUCH.—Why do we not require the same class of officers upon the administrative and instructional staffs?

Mr. McCAY.—Because the examination in these special subjects is intended to be confined to the special expert arms of the service, namely, the Engineers and the Artillery.

Mr. CROUCH.—What about French and Latin?

Mr. McCAY.—A man must have literary qualifications, too, otherwise he could not perform his work properly.

Mr. CROUCH.—Why is a knowledge of French required of a garrison artilleryman, when it is not insisted upon in the case of an instructional and administrative officer?

Mr. McCAY.—The garrison artilleryman is also an instructor to the Artillery generally. However, these subjects do not appear in the regulations, but in general orders. The honorable and learned member further objected to the six months' probation which an officer is required to serve, and to the qualifying military examination. I claim that the soldier possessed of practical experience has all the "pull" in regard to the qualifying examination.

Mr. CROUCH.—I do not object to that.

Mr. McCAY.—Then the honorable and learned member referred to the regulation relating to complaints. That regulation undoubtedly means that the man who has a complaint is at liberty to put his complaint before his senior officer, and, finally, before the Minister. If the officers do not forward such complaints to the Minister they are not obeying, but breaking, the regulation. It seems to me that the honorable and learned member's complaints—assuming that every word of them be true—are not complaints against the regulations, except in regard to particulars in which they are now being amended. They are complaints against the abuse, and not the use, of power. If a charge was duly made against any officer of having abused his power, I should not object to the fullest investigation. The honorable and learned member asks for the appointment of a Select Committee to amend regulations which are already being amended in the particulars to which he has referred.

Mr. CROUCH.—The amended regulations do not meet the case which I put in regard to complaints and appeals.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes, they do. I say that the regulation relating to complaints means that any man is entitled to have his own complaint put before the Minister.

Mr. CROUCH.—It has not been so read hitherto.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable and learned member wish a Select Committee to be appointed in order that the words "in writing" may be inserted in the regulations? Certainly, I never supposed that any but the aggrieved individual's own complaint was to come before the Minister. Every complaint which reached me was the man's own complaint, and not his commanding officer's version of it.

Mr. CROUCH.—Through a member of Parliament?

Mr. McCAY.—No; through the official channel. It is not good from the point of view of discipline that complaints should reach the Minister except through the proper channel.

Mr. CROUCH.—I quite agree with the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McCAY.—As a matter of fact, the honorable and learned member's practice does not agree with his precepts.

Mr. CROUCH.—It is only where a man cannot get his complaint before the Minister, through the proper channel, that I take action.

Mr. McCAY.—When a man is unable to have his complaint brought before the Minister, through the proper channel, he is justified in seeking other assistance, because the regulations have been broken to his disadvantage, and no other remedy is open to him. I have never known of a case in which a man who wished to have his complaint sent on to the Minister met with a refusal. As to the case of the man Webb, I must say that the honorable and learned member for Corio has mentioned a large number of facts that are new to me. I had the whole of Webb's complaints before me, as Minister—I cannot say at whose instance they were brought under my notice—but there was nothing in the papers to show that he was labouring under a sense of injustice. So far as I can recollect, he submitted a written complaint, which did not show that he was labouring under a sense of wrong.

Mr. FISHER.—It seems strange that he should have given up his position.

Mr. McCAY.—Quite so; but I would urge the House not to unnecessarily interfere with that which is so essential in the Forces—sound discipline. The proper persons to frame regulations are the Minister and the expert officers who advise him.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The Select Committee would not interfere with the Minister.

Mr. McCAY.—I can assure the honorable member that such inquiries are not good for the morale and discipline of the Forces. The feeling that there is constant political interference, as contrasted with Parliamentary control, is doing, and has done, great harm in the Forces. In view of the amendments that are being made, the charges of the honorable and learned member for Corio are levelled not against the regulations, but against abuses of the regulations, and they are matters for investigation by a proper court. If an officer has done all the wrongs that are said to have been perpetrated, he ought to be court-martialled; the whole question should be decided by the proper tribunal.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable and learned member will admit that Parliament has some responsibility in these matters.

Mr. McCAY.—Finally, when there is no other remedy for a wrong, Parliament should step in. I do hope, however, that the honorable and learned member for Corio will recognise, on consideration, that his charges relate really to abuses of, and not to any defect in, the regulations, except in so far as concerns particulars in which they are being amended. As to the regulations against marriage without leave, I would remind the House that they relate to a question of policy. Personally, I think that they ought to exist, but a Select Committee is not necessary to enable us to form an opinion on a question of policy of that kind. I rose only to deal briefly with the matter, in so far as it might affect the late Administration, and I submit that the honorable and learned member for Corio has not justified his demand for a Select Committee.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—I have listened attentively to the speech delivered by the honorable and learned member for Corio, and have come to the conclusion that most of the allegations he has made are fit subjects for departmental inquiry. In my opinion, the honorable and learned member would have been better advised had he submitted his case to the Minister of Defence before bringing it under the notice of this House. If he had failed to obtain redress in that way, it would then have been open to him to move a vote of censure on the Administration. It is proposed that I should be a member of the Select Committee, but I desire to have my name omitted from the list, as I intend to oppose the motion. There is of late an alarming tendency to grant Select Committees to inquire into every conceivable subject, and in this way Parliament is not only escaping much of its responsibility, but is permitting Ministers to do the same. The honorable member for Bland will remember a time not far back in the history of the State Parliament of New South Wales when it was most difficult to secure the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the administration of a Department. The appointment of a Select Committee for such a purpose was regarded as the most severe vote of censure that could be passed against a Ministry. The honorable and learned member for Corio has made a statement to the House, upon which statement alone we are asked to put the country to the expense of a lengthy inquiry by a Select Committee.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It all comes from having a Government that can live only by granting concessions.

Mr. WATSON.—The Reid-Cook Government in the State Parliament lived by concessions.

Mr. WILKS.—The Reid-McLean Administration also appointed one or two Commissions. I have moved for a return showing the cost incurred so far in connexion with these inquiries, and am satisfied that when it is published it will come as a staggerer to the people. I complain not so much of the expenditure which the appointment of Select Committees necessarily involves, as of the fact that in this way Ministers are enabled to escape the official responsibilities of their office. If we are to have a roving inquiry in this case, where will the matter end? You, Mr. Speaker, have already ruled out of order to-day a motion, submitted by the Attorney-General, which showed a desire on the part of the Government to absolutely escape from Ministerial responsibility. The honorable and learned member for Corio admits that the bulk of his charges can be met only by an inquiry into the whole military service, and I agree that that is so. The honorable member for Bland interjected that he knew of similar cases to those quoted by the honorable and learned member for Corio, and I believe that many of us can say the same. It is because I know that there is a military caste in Australia, and because I feel satisfied that much of the money voted for defence purposes is spent in a way that gives no adequate return, that I am always strongly opposed to voting large sums of money towards military expenditure.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member is now making a new charge.

Mr. WILKS.—I am simply pointing out that there should be really a military inquiry. We have appointed a Military Board, to which this complaint might well be referred. I can imagine the concern of honorable members when they find that, although we are prepared to devote large sums to the defence of Australia, a considerable proportion of the money voted for that purpose is expended in a way that will give the country no adequate return. Unfortunately, many military men appear to believe that the State exists for them, and not that they exist to serve the State, and a man in the ranks seeking redress of a grievance finds so many difficulties in the way that he often abandons the attempt in disgust. The honorable and learned member for Corio referred to the official objection that Watts had not had a sufficiently high scholastic training. We know that as a matter of fact many of the non-commissioned officers have higher literary and scholastic attainments than have commissioned officers, and it seems to me that all that is necessary in that direction is that a man should have a thorough acquaintance with mathematics. Corporal Watts served his country in South Africa, and yet, because he could not pass a certain scholastic examination, he was refused promotion.

Mr. WEBSTER.—He has been driven out of the service.

Mr. WILKS.—I was not aware of that; but his experience may be that of any other man in the ranks. We all know that it is easier to pass an examination in our school days than it is a few years later, and that a man cannot apply himself so closely to study as can the boy who has just left school. My idea of many of those possessing high academic degrees is summed up in the words of Carlyle, who spoke of them as being little men with big crutches. We often find that a man who has had a brilliant University career is in the practical walks of life.

Many of the men who went to South Africa, and who possessed high academic degrees, were often found absolutely wanting as practical soldiers. I have very little faith in scholastic examinations in respect of military service. Without desiring to reflect on any honorable member, I would point out that there are among our number some who can claim to have been gold medalists, and yet, so far from their being effective or useful members of this House, they are lost in the ruck. I know from personal experience that a good deal of what was said by the honorable and learned member for Corio was true, and that for many years there were in our permanent service officers who were nothing more nor less than derelicts. I was personally acquainted with a number of them, and know that they were simply pensioners on the State. Their vitality was exhausted, and their mental powers impaired, so that in time of need they would have been almost useless. It is because of that knowledge that I have on several occasions opposed the granting of large sums for the upkeep of our Military Forces. I agree with the honorable and learned member for Corinella that discipline must not be impaired.

Mr. FISHER.—But it must apply to both officers and men.

Mr. WILKS.—Yes. While the ranker is compelled to act according to the canons of good taste, a similar obligation must rest on the officer. In Australia the ranker cannot any longer be despised. I know, not from personal acquaintance, but from a knowledge of his history, that one of our most expert State commandants was originally a ranker in the artillery service, and obtained his present position only after years of struggle. There has been no keener or better mathematician in our military forces; but, time and again, social influence was brought to bear against him in New South Wales, because certain colonels, when in the service, were opposed to his advancement, for the reason that his wife did not belong to the same social grade as their wives belonged to.

Mr. FISHER.—That is a more serious charge than the charge made by the honorable and learned member for Corio.

Mr. WILKS.—Not a more serious, but an equally serious charge. While I agree with a good deal that was said by the honorable and learned member, I do not think that he gave sufficient reasons for the appointment of a Select Committee. The regulations into which he wishes it to inquire can be taken exception to by any honorable member in this House. If he puts these cases before the Military Board, or the Minister, and no notice is taken of them, he will then have the right to appeal to this House to compel the Government to do justice, but the appointment of Select Committees is absolutely becoming a scandal. I do not object to Select Committees only because of the expenditure which they cause, or the small fees which are paid to their members.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No fees are paid to members.

Mr. WILKS.—It is of no use to beat round the bush. I know that members of Select Committees and Royal Commissions are not paid so much a day for their services, but when they are travelling they receive very liberal travelling allowances. I should not, however, oppose the motion if I thought that the appointment of a Select Committee was justified in this instance. In addition to the cash expended by members of Select Committees and Royal Commissions, there is the expense incidental to the collection of information. I defy any honorable member to instance a case in which during nearly five years, the report of a Select Committee or Royal Commission has been acted on. Their recommendations are merely so much waste paper. I regard the tendency to appoint Select Committees as likely to weaken responsible Government. A Minister has only to get into an awkward corner, and an obliging member of Parliament will move for a Select Committee to get him out of his difficulty. We pay Ministers high salaries to perform certain work, and surround them with highly-paid officials to give expert advice. Why, then, should it be necessary for Select Committees to deal with matters of administration? When I have received the information for which I have asked, I intend to obtain an expression of opinion from the House on the subject of the appointment of Select Committees and Royal Commissions, and I shall address myself to the question without fear or favour of any honorable member. It is the duty of the Minister of Defence to deal with the cases which have been referred to by the honorable and learned member for Corio. At the same time, I agree with the honorable and learned member that if any branch of the service requires purging it is the military branch, and I shall always hesitate about voting large sums for military expenditure, not because I think that money is not required for the defence of Australia, but because I know of the rotten system which exists.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I must oppose the motion, because it seems to me that the honorable and learned member for Corio can obtain redress without a Select Committee. As he is a lawyer, I regret that he should have put forward mere hearsay as evidence, and I was still more surprised to hear the remarks of the honorable member for Darwin. If there is one honorable member in the House who knows what baseless charges may be brought against a man it is the honorable member for Darwin.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I beat them at the Police Court.

Mr. CONROY.—I regret, too, that the honorable and learned member for Corio mentioned the names of officers who will have no opportunity to reply to his charges.

Mr. CROUCH.—I wish to give them an opportunity.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable and learned member's remarks will go forth to the public, but these officers, as servants of the Commonwealth, will be unable to put their side of the case. There is a way in which any private or officer may obtain a remedy for any grievance; he has only to act in accordance with the regulations provided in this case. As the honorable and learned member has not shown that the regulations are deficient, it will be my duty to vote against the motion. I shall be perfectly willing to assist the honorable and learned member, or any other honorable member, to obtain the repeal of regulations which prevent men from appealing, if such regulations exist; but their existence has not been proved. No one will ever accuse me of being too ready to back up the military. My speeches show that I do not lean in that direction. The honorable and learned member has made out no case for the appointment of a Select Committee. It appears to me that the most that can be charged against any one is an error of judgment.

Mr. KELLY.—In any case, the honorable and learned member proposes to inquire, not into the actions of the officers of whom he has complained, but into the effect of the regulations, which is quite another matter.

Mr. CONROY.—Yes. Although he made certain charges, he gave no reasons for appointing the Select Committee for which he asks, because he said nothing which tends to show that the regulations are insufficient or too arbitrary.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY (Darwin).—I trust that the motion will be carried. If the statements made in the quiet, sensible, and unprejudiced speech of the honorable and learned member for Corio are true—and they look to me to be true—they should be investigated. Some of these aristocratic officers would have no hesitation about separating a cripple from his crutches.

Mr. WILSON.—Then why not ask the Minister to investigate the charges?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—This Parliament is the palladium of the liberties of the Commonwealth—the institution to which every man should be able to appeal for justice; and if Ministers, inspired by their officers, fail to accord fair treatment to the members of the Defence Force, we should step in and see that all wrongs are righted. Unfortunately, men in subordinate positions are not in a position to adequately protect themselves against unjust acts on the part of their officers, and I am afraid that unless some action is taken in the direction proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corio, Corporal Watts will suffer. The military caste is gaining ground all over the world. Only a few years ago Admiral Sampson who did not fight the battle of Santiago, but left Admiral Sley to do the hard work whilst he was on dry land, endeavoured to introduce such rules and regulations as would have prevented any man, excepting the son of rich parents, from becoming a naval officer. The same thing is happening here. Only a few years ago a Minister in one of the States had the conditions for the admission of officers into the Defence Forces altered in order to permit of the appointment of a relative of some influential person who was not able to pass the ordinary examination. When General Phil. Sheridan was in command of the United States Army in the Valley of the Shenandoah, one of his aristocratic officers complained that a private had not saluted him, and when the soldier explained that he had not recognised the officer in his private dress, the General made the officer walk up and down in front of the army for three hours a day in order that every soldier should learn to recognise him. The old aristocratic military classes of Europe are spent forces, and are no longer good for fighting purposes. It is the Corporal Watts upon whom we have to depend for our defence. Every general in the United States Army who has ever won a battle is opposed to frill, and some of the best soldiers who have fought on the battle-fields of that country were unable to pass the military examinations. Jackson and Lee, and others, failed at the military college, but they were able to fight. We want fighters in this country. I am opposed to the whole military system, which, I think, should be entirely wiped out of existence. But if we have to put up with it, we should encourage soldiers rather than ballet-dancers. Why was the French Army annihilated by the Germans? Because the former were commanded by dancing-masters. We do not read anything about the examinations which the Japanese soldiers were required to pass, and yet they were able to lick the greatest of nations upon the battle-fields of Manchuria. In this country we are endeavouring to imitate the failures of Europe. We should wipe out the whole of the military system and devote the money now spent upon defences to settling people on the land. Among the Indian tribes in Mexico the most humble of redskins can interview the great Sagamore, and can talk to him quite freely; but I understand that the Australian soldier, who has the right to vote, cannot go before an officer who wears a peacock's feather in his nose. According to the honorable and learned member for Corio, a private soldier is not admitted into the presence of one of these gilded-spurred roosters. We are required to vote £700,000 or £800,000 per annum in order to support a military sham. I shall support the motion, because I think that the Military Department is, of all others, a fit subject for close investigation. I want to have some of these dancing-masters examined. If Corporal Watts had money—and it makes me sick to hear it stated that money does not count in Australia—it would not make any difference if his mother was a laundry woman, or his sister was married to a Chinaman. So long as he had £5,000 a year, and could give a ball two or three times a year, and shout champagne for his superior officers he would be all right. That is the kind of thing to which I strongly object. The time has come for a full investigation, which I hope will result in a decision to entirely abolish our military system. So long as we are a part of the British Empire no nation can attack Australia without also attacking Great Britain. As a nation, we are at peace, and are engaged in commerce with all the nations of the earth, and it is about time that we came to the conclusion that our defence forces are an incubus. I hope that the Committee will be appointed, and that the result of their inquiry will be the beginning of the end of the whole of our military pomp and parade.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—Honorable members were in the first place asked to appoint a Select Committee to report upon the military regulations, with a view to their being amended in such respects as might be considered desirable. The honorable and learned member for Corio, however, did not deal so much with the defects of the regulations as with the administration of certain officers. He did not devote his attention to showing that the regulations were not drawn in such a way as to insure discipline, and, what is equally important, content and good feeling among the members of the forces. Then the honorable member for Darwin has characteristically objected to the maintenance of a lot of gilt-spurred roosters, and has at the same time rolled off his tongue in a way that other honorable members have found it impossible to imitate a number of high-sounding titles, such as that of the Grand Sagamore of the Mexican Indians, and of various gentlemen of the Courts of America, of which the honorable member was at one time an ornament. He told us that the question we had to consider was whether or not we should encourage frill in the Department. Honorable members will therefore see that the debate has been carried far beyond its original scope.

Mr. PAGE.—The regulations deal with frill as well as with other matters.

Mr. KELLY.—So far as that matter is concerned, I am in entire accord with what I know to be the views of the honorable member. The first question we have to consider is whether such reasons have been advanced as would justify us in appointing a Select Committee to make an inquiry into the regulations. The honorable and learned member for Corio did not advance any such reasons.

Mr. PAGE.—The Government are amending the regulations.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, we have just had them revised.

Mr. KELLY.—I was about to mention that phase of the question. The Government are amending the regulations, and therefore the honorable and learned member for Corio had only to wait until they were brought before the House in order to move in the direction of their amendment if he so desired.

Mr. CROUCH.—That has been attempted in the Senate in regard to other regulations, and it has proved an impossible procedure, because unless a motion bearing upon them be debated and adopted within thirty days, the regulations are in force.

Mr. KELLY.—I fail to see that it would be possible for a Government to deliberately postpone consideration of these regulations until such time as a motion relating to them would lapse.

Mr. CROUCH.—The motion which I submitted this afternoon has been upon the notice-paper for more than thirty days.

Mr. KELLY.—But the honorable and learned member would be at liberty to move the adjournment of the House at any time for the purpose of directing attention to the action of the Government in refusing to provide an opportunity to debate regulations laid upon the table for indorsement. Inasmuch as the honorable and learned member has not officially asked the Government to amend the regulations in a concise way—

Mr. CROUCH.—I forwarded these suggestions to the Minister of Defence some four years ago.

Mr. KELLY.—May I ask the honorable and learned member whether he desires any special regulations to be amended?

Mr. CROUCH.—I have written officially to the Minister in regard to two of them, but there are about twenty which require amendment.

Mr. KELLY.—I ask the House to consider the number of regulations that have been framed under the Defence Act of 1903. There are regulations governing almost every conceivable subject. For instance, there are regulations governing the conduct of a military college, the enrolment of all persons liable to service, the rates of pay for all branches of the Forces, leave of absence and furlough to members, the convening, composition, and procedure of courts-martial; the assurance of the lives of married men, the formation and management of rifle clubs, the control of rifle associations, &c. If the motion under consideration contemplates dealing with only twenty regulations, those regulations should be definitely set out. It seems to me that the honorable and learned member for Corio is asking for powers which we ought not to grant.

Mr. CROUCH.—An inquiry by a Select Committee would occupy only about three days.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable and learned member has had considerable experience of Select Committees. Does he mean to tell me that a body comprised of the gentlemen whose names are specified in this motion, would be content to scamp an inquiry of so far-reaching a character? We all know the way in which Select Committees examine their witnesses. The unfortunate victim is placed at the head of the table. The chairman conducts the examination-in-chief, and the members of the committee then cross-examine the witness, in rotation. The majority of those members are not lawyers, and are, therefore, not gifted in the art of cross-examination. Then the honorable and learned member for Corio should have shown whether this Committee would be qualified to deal with these intricate and technical questions. I do not think that he should have allowed so important a point to escape his attention. I question whether the gentlemen whose names are mentioned in the motion are qualified to act as an expert body upon all phases of the Defence regulations, a few of which I have detailed.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Nobody suggests that they should undertake that task.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Most of them are military men.

Mr. KELLY.—Honorable members, who have seen active service, are not necessarily qualified to deal with all sorts of defence subjects, apart from the particular branch with which they have been associated.

Mr. SALMON.—They are better qualified than are those who have not seen service.

Mr. KELLY.—I agree with the honorable member. But why appoint a Committee at all, when we merely require to lay down general rules for the guidance of those who frame these regulations? I am quite at one with those who urge that there should be no such thing as caste in our Military Department. The only recommendation for promotion in the service should be efficiency. The moment the Minister has his attention directed to the fact that this House does not consider that candidates should be examined in certain subjects, he will doubtless notify the responsible officers to that effect, and they will give effect to our wishes.

Mr. PAGE.—Under the new regulations, the Minister has no more power than has any other member of the Council of Defence.

Mr. KELLY.—I think that the honorable member for Maranoa will admit that effect must be given to the desires of the Government. We all know that one of the principles laid down by the members of the Socialistic Party is that the administration of the various Government Departments should be free from all political influence, and that, therefore, they should be placed in the hands of Commissioners. The honorable member for Bland has frequently stated that every new Department which is created should be administered in the same way as are our railways. What the honorable and learned member for Corio proposes is that we should exercise over the Military Commission a control other than the legitimate control which this House exercises over all Departments. The legitimate control which we should exercise over all Departments is through the Government. When honorable members are of opinion that an Administration is not fulfilling its proper functions of watching the administration of Departments, it is their duty to displace it. Certainly it is not their duty to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the matter. I have already said that the only guide to promotion in the Defence Department should be efficiency. When the Government, of which the honorable member for Bland was the head, was in power. I drew attention to a number of hardships to which non-commissioned officers were subjected. I pointed to a few instances similar to those which were alluded to by the honorable and learned member for Corio, in which officers who had received the King's commission upon the field in South Africa had been denied promotion here on their return to the Commonwealth. That is much to be regretted. It is a loss not only to the officers themselves, but to the Commonwealth, that we cannot retain in these responsible positions those who have so signally served their country in the field.

Mr. PAGE.—That is what the honorable and learned member for Corio has contended.

Mr. KELLY.—I am absolutely with the honorable and learned member so far as that point is concerned.

Mr. CROUCH.—I brought the matter up three years ago, and should like to see a new regulation dealing with it.

Mr. KELLY.—There should be such a regulation. We should ask the Government to see that those who have served their country so well shall receive at the hands of the Commonwealth the recognition to which they are entitled. I have shown what I consider to be the course which this House should adopt. I brought this question forward, and asked the Ministry of which the honorable and learned member for Bland was the leader to consider it, with a view to rectifying the anomaly.

Mr. PAGE.—But the honorable member voted against that Government.

Mr. KELLY.—That was on general principles, which were manifestly just.

Mr. CROUCH.—Would it not be fair to appoint the Committee for which I ask, and to refer the question to it?

Mr. KELLY.—I certainly do not think so. We should not in that way facilitate action in the matter. Numberless Select Committees have been appointed, and re-appointed session after session, by both branches of the Legislature, and they are doing a voluminous work; but there seems to be no finality to their investigations.

Mr. PAGE.—There will be in this case.

Mr. KELLY.—I understand that it is vouched that this Select Committee, if it be appointed, will furnish its report in a very short time.

Mr. PAGE.—It will take a month to report.

Mr. KELLY.—Is the honorable member sure that the members of the Committee would not have to work overtime?

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member is trying to talk the motion out.

Mr. KELLY.—I do not wish to delay the House dealing with the matter. My desire is that we shall proceed to a vote, if the Government will consent, and that we shall deal with the proposal for a Select Committee in the way that all such propositions should be dealt with when no sufficient reason is forthcoming for the appointment. The honorable and learned member for Corio did me the honour of asking me to join the proposed Committee, and I regretted at the time that I was not in a position to do so. The reason I refuse to serve on it is that I think that, in the first place, the less political influence—and I use the term “political influence” as opposed to “proper parliamentary control”—we exercise on a great Department that depends so largely for its efficiency on discipline, the better for the service of this country.

Mr. PAGE.—Then we might as well let the military officers run the show.

Mr. KELLY.—I do not propose that they should do so. I should like to see the House lay down principles which should guide the Department in its general control.

Mr. PAGE.—We have done so in the Defence Act.

Mr. KELLY.—If those general principles have been ignored, it is the duty of the House to call on the Administration of the day to see that they are henceforth properly carried out. If the Government of the day will not take action, it is our duty to get a Government that will.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Could not such a Committee as is proposed indicate to the Government what ought to be done?

Mr. KELLY.—What would be the use of appointing a Committee to do that? If the House could not successfully indicate its wishes to the Government, how could a mere Committee do so? If the Government did not wish to take action, if it were so absolutely stiff-necked that it refused to act in accordance with the wish of the House, would it not ignore a report by a Select Committee? While I am of opinion that soldiers should be treated as soldiers, and kept as far removed as possible from political influence of the sort that is behind this motion, no one recognises more than I do the duty—

Mr. WATSON.—Surely regulations are a matter of policy, and, as such, are a proper subject for political interference.

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable and learned member for Corio has given us no evidence of faulty regulations; he has simply shown that the regulations are faultily administered. Unless the House is prepared to admit that it has outlived its usefulness—that it cannot do its own work, but must delegate it to Select Committees—we ought to refuse to pass the motion. I shall not vote against it from any desire that a system of class distinction should continue to exist—if it does exist, as alleged—in the military services of the Commonwealth; I shall vote against it solely because I believe that if the Select Committee were appointed, and allowed to deal with all the technical phases of the Defence regulations, it would not be in the interest either of the Department or of those officers and men who are so well carrying out the duties which this House has intrusted to them.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—The debate has conclusively proven to my mind that even if a Select Committee be not appointed, some inquiry should be made into the charges that have been levelled against the Defence Department by the honorable and learned member for Corio. I desire to thank him from the bottom of my heart for the way in which he has exposed the tactics of certain military officers, and stood up in defence of the rank and file of the Commonwealth Army. Having served in the ranks, I know how important it is that discipline should be maintained, and, like the honorable member for Wentworth, I fear that a Parliamentary inquiry might be subversive of true discipline. Once we set aside discipline, we might as well let the whole system go by the board. If members of the Commonwealth Forces can induce honorable members to air their individual views in this House, all semblance of discipline will quickly disappear. Whatever we may do, our desire should always be to see discipline maintained, not only among the men, but among the officers of our forces. The honorable and learned member for Corio has certainly disclosed a scandalous state of affairs. I felt highly indignant when I heard that an officer and a gentleman had so far forgotten himself as to put to a candidate for promotion such questions as those to which reference was made by the honorable and learned member for Corio.

Mr. WATSON.—If he put such questions, was he a gentleman?

Mr. PAGE.—No; no one but a cad would have made such inquiries. So far as military service is concerned, it is immaterial what a man's position in life may have been. We have only to turn to the life of Napoleon, and to remember where he obtained his brainiest men.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Napoleon's marshals.

Mr. PAGE.—All his marshals were men of lowly birth. I know of many men who proved themselves soldiers in the fullest sense of the word, and yet were of lowly birth. I have known men to be promoted from the rank of gunners in the artillery, and of troopers in the mounted forces, because of their gallant deeds in the field. I remember hearing Colley say of privates who had distinguished themselves in the fields of South Africa, "These men are soldiers, and must be at once promoted." When men are promoted on the field in this way, surely promotion should not be refused a man in the Commonwealth Forces for no other reason than that he is of lowly birth. I would remind honorable members that when the present Treasurer was introducing the Defence Bill, he said, emphatically—and I believe he meant every word that he uttered—that, so far as he was concerned, every private in the ranks should have an opportunity to qualify for the post of General Officer Commanding if he had the requisite ability. He declared that if a ranker showed merit, promotion would not be denied him. But since the passing of the regulations framed under the Defence Act, a military caste had been created by our officers, and men who are not of social rank or of noble birth are strictly tabooed. The sooner we rid the Commonwealth of such a system the better. The honorable member for Laanecoorie some time ago brought under notice the case of two men—the one being a man of means with influential friends, and the other having neither influence nor money—who had applied for promotion in the forces, and he showed that the man without social influence was denied promotion.

Mr. SALMON.—But he obtained it.

Mr. CROUCH. — Senator Dawson, when Minister of Defence, saw that justice was done him.

Mr. PAGE.—I know that the honorable member for Laanecoorie was put to much trouble in seeing that justice was done to this man. He interviewed the Minister, and also the General Officer Commanding, but they constantly put him off. I am very pleased to hear from the honorable and learned member that the man did get on. The honorable member for Wentworth said that the regulations open up a field in which technical knowledge is required; but if honorable members are not competent to deal with them, it is a strange thing that the Act requires that they be laid on the table of this House, so that we may suggest improvements or alterations, or make any objections in regard to them. If the regulations are too harsh, this is the proper place in which to complain about them. I am very pleased that the special board has been done away with. A man used to be brought before that board, and before being allowed to compete for the rank of an officer, practically court-martialled, or, as they say in the service, paraded and carpeted. Fancy being asked who one's father and mother were, who one's sisters are, to whom they are married, and what are their social positions! I would smack a man in the jaw very quickly if he asked me such questions. It does not matter whether my mother is a laundry woman or anything else, she is still my mother; and I would not allow any one to insult me by asking questions about her. If I had been in Watts' position, I would have moved heaven and earth to obtain my just rights. If what the honorable and learned member for Corio has stated is true, the officers to blame deserve, not censure only, but cashiering. In the Imperial Service, the Duke of Cambridge used to ride along the ranks at parade at Woolwich, or any of the other garrison towns, once a year, and any man who had a complaint to make could, if every other remedy failed, step out and state his grievance to the Field Marshal. Apparently, however, the Commanding Officer could not be approached by Corporal Watts. But if in the Imperial Service a private may approach the Field Marshal, surely our officers should not consider themselves so great as to be unapproachable. There is another aspect of the case. We find Colonel Ricardo saying that a man is a fit subject for promotion, but three or four months afterwards, when this special inquiry board has sent word that his mother is not of the right stamp, or that his sisters are not married correctly, or has raised some objection of that kind, Colonel Hoad turns round—

Mr. DEAKIN.—What Colonel Hoad did was to refer the matter to the officer who had made the recommendation.

Mr. PAGE.—He asked the recommending officer, "Do you still recommend him in the face of this evidence?" If the Prime Minister were to recommend a man, would he not first make inquiry about him? Colonel Ricardo recommended this man as competent to present himself for examination. So far as examinations are concerned, the man has shown himself worthy of every honour and credit. The honorable and learned member for Corio has said that he has a continuous record of successes from the day he joined the service until the present day. He is a top-notch in everything that he has undertaken—gunnery, flag-signalling, and everything else. His sleeve is covered with badges of distinction. He has served in the field in South Africa, and has been promoted there, being made a lieutenant.

He did not require Latin or Greek when in South Africa, neither did those in authority there wish to know what his father and mother were. Yet, when he comes back home, instead of getting honor and glory, he is told that he is not wanted, because his social rank is not sufficient. Is that the way to treat our soldiers? Is that the way in which any of us would like to be treated? If the man is good enough as a fighting machine, he is good enough to be an officer. He may not be able to do the "lah-de-dah" in the drawing-room, or to parade round the ladies at a garden party; but he must have been a man and a soldier to have gained distinction on the field. That is the point which I wish to make. I should like the Prime Minister to find out why Colonel Ricardo went back on his first recommendation. I know that officer well, and some honorable members may have heard how he distinguished himself in South Africa. He ought to be an authority as to what constitutes a soldier and a man, because he got roasted enough in the Queensland Courts on the subject. If ever a man suffered, he did, and he should be the last to try to put another into a hole like that in which he was at one time in Queensland. I thought that he had forgotten all about that sort of business, and would give every man a square deal. I did not expect this of him. But I shall not condemn him until I know why he changed his mind in regard to this man. We do not desire that a military caste shall spring into existence in Australia.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We have got one already.

Mr. PAGE.—I am sorry to think that the seeds have been planted, but it is within the power of the Prime Minister to root them out, and the regulations framed by the honorable and learned member for Coriella will go a long way towards doing so. If those regulations were carried out in accordance with their spirit, there would be no trouble. I appeal to the Prime Minister to see that the charges which have been made by the honorable and learned member for Corio are either refuted or proved.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I wish to say a word or two on this matter, because it seems to me that the main issue is being lost sight of to some extent by the discussion of the details of the several charges which have been made by the honorable and learned member for Corio. The members of the Opposition seem to think that it is not the function of this House to investigate actions which seriously imperil the efficiency of the Military Service. I cannot see that the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the truth of the definite statements which have been made will interfere with discipline, and we are far more likely to impair the efficiency of the service by refusing to let in the light upon these matters than by making an investigation. In a country like this, every one should know that Parliament represents all sections of the community, and that no military caste can be successfully set up. Delicacy should not prevent us from fully considering this matter. Are not the records of the Parliament of the mother country full of instances, known to the students of history, in which members have dealt with matters of military administration? Was it not objected, when members of the House of Commons tried to abolish the cruel system of flogging, which, at one time, prevailed in the Army, and the abuse to which it led, that by doing so, discipline was likely to be interfered with? To say that we have no right to voice the wrongs of the humblest man in the service is to misunderstand our sacred obligations. The late Minister of Defence said that he had looked through the papers relating to the case of Corporal Watts, and was of opinion that he could do nothing but concur in the recommendations made. Yet he admitted immediately afterwards that those recommendations were made under regulations which were so bad as to require amendment, and that he, therefore, caused a new set of regulations to be framed, which would prevent the recurrence of similar abuses in the future. His position was that he concurred in recommendations under which a man suffered injustice, because of the regulations then in force, but that if the new regulations, which were framed because of the treatment meted out to this man, had been in existence, he would have been entitled to very different treatment. What will be the position, if a Select Committee is appointed? Is it to be supposed for a moment that it would do an injustice to either the men or the officers of our Defence Forces? Could it be suggested that the members of the Committee would not have as much regard for the good name of Australia as would any other members of this House? Honorable members who have opposed the motion have entirely begged the question. We have been told on previous occasions when abuses have been brought under our notice that any attempt at investigation would probably involve an interference with discipline, or hamper those who have charge of the Forces, and it invariably happens that obstacles are placed in the way of inquiries such as that now proposed. Take the case of the administration of the Lands Department in New South Wales. Although it was well known that that Department was being administered in a manner inimical to the best interests of the people, those who agitated for an inquiry were told that the case which they had brought forward was not strong enough to justify their proposal. They were told that it was not right to proceed upon mere hearsay information. We now hear the same old cry. Results are not only justifying the appointment of the Lands Commission in New South Wales, but they are showing that those who placed obstacles in the way of the appointment of the Commission at an earlier date were guilty of criminal neglect of their public duties. We are told that we should not appoint the proposed Select Committee because its inquiries might result in offence to the heads of the Military Department. The jealous regard which has been shown for the rights and privileges of the officers of the Defence Forces indicates to me that existing conditions are in accord with the desire of some honorable members; they evidently fear that an investigation might result in radical changes. I shall support the motion, because I think that a very strong case has been made out by the honorable and learned member for Corio. No man should have been subjected to the indignity which Corporal Watts had to suffer. The honorable member for Maranoa very plainly indicated what would have been the result had such questions been put to him. That, however, was not the worst feature of the case. Corporal Watts was not able to make his way to the fountain head of justice. He was thwarted at every turn. His case was not allowed to be placed before the Minister, or to filter through him to Parliament. That seems to me to be the gravamen of his case. I would appeal to the Prime Minister to consent to the appointment of the proposed Committee, whose investigations need not occupy any great length of time. We need not have such a rambling inquiry as was indicated by the honorable member for Wentworth. I do not desire to see any affront put upon the officers of the Defence Forces, but we should make it perfectly clear to them that they are directly under the eye of this Parliament—that they must treat their men fairly, and that if they do not their presence in the Forces will no longer be tolerated.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—When the Defence Act was passed, it was specially provided that Parliament should not lose its control over the Defence Forces, and I think that those honorable members who are urging that the appointment of the proposed Select Committee would involve an interference with discipline, and would have a prejudicial effect upon the Forces, must have lost sight of the fact that Parliament has specially reserved to itself the right to review everything that occurs in this Department. Honorable members must have been deeply pained when they listened to the honorable and learned member for Corio, and it must have been a matter of keen regret to the Prime Minister to hear such charges made against the officers of the Defence Forces. We have been told that we have heard only one side of the case; but, judging from my own experience, I am afraid that only too much of what has been stated by the honorable and learned member is true. I fear that if an inquiry is made it will transpire that certain men have been subjected under the regulations to hardships which were never contemplated by honorable members when the Defence Act was passed. I recognise that we are treading on very delicate ground in taking action upon ex parte statements. But I feel that the cases which have been brought under our notice are so strong that if we declined to order an inquiry of some sort, we should lay ourselves open to a charge of gross dereliction of duty. A grave responsibility rests upon us, and we should take care to completely purge the Defence Forces of all those elements which conduce to disgraceful proceedings such as those described. During the time that Major-General Hutton was General Officer Commanding, the discipline of our Force reached its highest point. The most complete discipline was enforced, from the second in command right down to the latest recruit. Since the departure of Major-General Hutton, however, the discipline which was previously exerted in the case of the officers has been relaxed, and rigorous conditions have been applied only to the lower ranks of the service. The late General Officer Commanding brought with him from the old country rather extreme ideas, but they had the merit of equity in that they were applied to all ranks. That cannot be said of present conditions. Whether these matters can be dealt with under regulation or not is open to question. We have one body constituted under the Defence Act which might deal with such subjects most effectively, but unfortunately it is composed very largely of officers such as those who have been criticised this afternoon. I feel sure that the Prime Minister will take steps to insure a searching investigation, and that the inquiry will be conducted not by those immediately concerned, but by persons who will not be in any way affected by the result. The Prime Minister has been good enough to allow me to glance at the proposed new regulations, and I regret to say that, in one respect, at all events, they do not appear to me to provide for any improvement upon those now in force. I believe that, if some have their way, the morale of the Army Medical Corps will be most seriously interfered with, and that we shall not be able to preserve what I advisedly call the high state of efficiency to which that branch of the Forces has attained. I would urge upon the Prime Minister the desirability of bringing this matter under the notice of the Minister of Defence. I shall be satisfied to abide by his decisions. An unusual position arises in regard to the Army Medical Corps. In the old country it was provided that professional members of the forces, such as members of the medical profession serving in the Army Medical Corps, should rank equally with combatant officers. That rule has been adopted here, and at present the head of the Army Medical Corps is of higher rank than the Inspector-General of the Commonwealth Forces. We have been exceptionally fortunate in securing the services of General Williams, who proved in South Africa that he was a man of capacity, and with exceptional powers of organization. I need only remind honorable members of that magnificent contingent of the Army Medical Corps which was despatched from New South Wales to South Africa during the Boer War, and which, under General Williams, showed that it was capable of doing work that had never before been attempted by the Royal Army Medical Corps. General Williams won his promotion in the field, and now has a world-wide reputation. He is the senior military officer of the Commonwealth, and I do not think that under the proposed new regulations he will be supported as he should be. It is necessary to maintain the Army Medical Corps in a high state of efficiency in times of peace. We have heard of what can be done in the way of organizing fighting forces upon the spur of the moment, but the organization of the Army Medical Service is a matter that cannot be undertaken at short notice, and our regulations must be so framed as to permit of that branch of the service being thoroughly trained. I feel sure that, irrespective of whether or not a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the matter, much good will result from this debate. I recognise that in the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence we have men who will sift these complaints to the very bottom, and who will see that action follows their investigations. Whether the motion be carried or rejected, the honorable and learned member for Corio will, therefore, have cause for satisfaction.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I am not in favour of the appointment of the Select Committee proposed, because I think that the creation of such a body would relieve Ministers of their proper responsibility. I claim that we should hold them responsible for seeing that justice is done to the men referred to by the honorable and learned member for Corio. I also think that the appointment of a Committee would scarcely accomplish the object which he has in view. His object is to right certain wrongs which he alleges have been committed under the Defence regulations. There is absolutely nothing in this motion which would permit of an inquiry being made into specific cases. The right to inquire into the Defence regulations does not confer the right to inquire into specific cases of injury. I do not think that we should interfere in these matters beyond impressing upon Ministers the necessity of doing their duty. If any wrongs have been done it is the duty of the Government to right them. I was astounded when I heard the statement which was made by the honorable member for Maranoa this afternoon, and I admire him for his spirit. If the questions to which he referred had been addressed to me, I should probably have acted as he suggested, and have been court-martialled for striking an officer. I hold that wealth confers upon us no rights other than those enjoyed by our fellows. A man who has neither rank nor money is, nevertheless, the equal of any other individual, so long as his character is good. I do not hold myself inferior to the Governor-General, Lord Northcote. I claim that as a man I am his equal.

Mr. CROUCH.—If the honorable member believes that, why does he not vote for this motion?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I say that the honorable and learned member will not achieve his object by the appointment of a Select Committee.

Mr. CROUCH.—I wish to deal with principles.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The honorable and learned member, I presume, desires that the wrongs of certain individuals shall be righted. I am quite in sympathy with his object. If the men to whom he has referred have lost positions to which they were entitled by reason of their merit, simply because their mothers may have been washerwomen, I say that they have been badly treated. There are many women toiling at the wash-tub who scarcely secure enough to eat, and who are superior to many who are rolling in wealth and ride in their carriages. The possession of wealth is no test of manhood or womanhood, and this House should not tolerate any distinctions of that kind. I feel very strongly upon these matters. I do not wish to point to my genealogy. I care not what my father or any of my relations may have been. I do not wish the world to judge me by them. It does not matter how noble they were if I am ignoble. Every man should stand upon his own merits. It is an outrage that men who have sprung from lowly origin should be refused positions to which their merit entitles them. The great Napoleon told his soldiers that every one of them carried a field marshal's bâton in his knapsack. That is the spirit which should be fostered here. No man should be questioned as to his antecedents. I am not in favour of spending large sums of money upon military organizations. If this Parliament and those of the States enacted proper legislation, they would cover the broad lands of this Continent, which are now held by a few monopolists, with tens of thousands of men and women, having happy homes and deriving their livelihood from the soil. If that condition of affairs obtained, we should not want to maintain much of an army. We should have people who would defend their homes to the last gasp, with the result that no nation would be able to invade this country. The sooner we set about the task of putting our house in order by placing men and women on the soil, the sooner the pressure upon us for expenditure upon military matters will pass away. We allow men to grow wealthy by our foolishness, and not by reason of what they earn. Then they parade their wealth as an evidence of their superiority. That is what we do in these democratic lands. I have no objection to the acquisition of wealth by any man. Every individual is entitled to what he earns, but he has no title to that which somebody else produces. If we gave every man what he earned, we should soon have a power in this land which would be able to resist all invasion and enable us to dispense with the large expenditure which we now incur upon defence matters. I am totally opposed to any military caste, but I am not in favour of dealing with it by the method proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corio.

Mr. LEE (Cowper).—After the discussion which has taken place upon this motion, I think that an inquiry is absolutely necessary in the interests, not only of the men, but of the officers whose names have been mentioned. Certain charges have been made against some of the officers, and a Select Committee is the proper tribunal to investigate them. I do not see why the Minister of Defence should be asked to undertake that task. At the same time, I think that the honorable and learned member for Corio should have first brought this matter under the notice of the Minister privately. Then, if he could not obtain redress, he would have been justified in drawing the attention of the House to the question. This afternoon nobody has made a more serious charge than the honorable member for Dalley, and it is only his objection to the appointment of Select Committees and Royal Commissions which induces him to oppose this motion. Personally, I am of opinion that we should let the world know that these military officers are responsible to this Parliament. In the interests of the Defence Department, I believe that the appointment of a Select Committee will result in much good, and therefore I shall support the motion.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—I am in entire sympathy with many of the remarks which have been made during the course of this debate. It seems to me that there is need for an inquiry into the charges which have been levelled against certain officers. I believe that that feeling pervades the whole House. The humblest unit in our military service should be taught to feel that he can rely upon justice being meted out to him, and that if he possesses the necessary merit there is no reason why he should not receive promotion. It is undesirable, perhaps, that this matter should be taken out of the hands of the Minister of Defence. But seeing that the names of two officers have been specially mentioned, it seems to me that they will demand that there should be a proper investigation of the charges preferred against them. Unless we can instil into the mind of every member of our Military Forces the knowledge that he has a fair chance of promotion—assuming that he possesses the necessary qualifications—we shall never create in Australia that citizen soldiery upon which our defences must ultimately rest. The disclosures which have been made to-day seem to me to deserve thorough consideration at the hands, not merely of the Ministry, but of the Parliament itself. It is essential, above all things, that we should encourage a sense of security, and the feeling that justice will be meted out to the humblest man in the community.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—The honorable member for Cowper has largely expressed the opinions that I intended to put before the House in reference to the position of the officers in question. It seems to me that they, as well as the men, have a right to be heard, and that even in their interests an inquiry should be held. To my mind, an investigation should be made by a Select Committee representing all parties in the House. Unfortunately, if a proposal is brought forward by the Government, it is at once viewed from a party stand-point, and it seems to me that it would be better in the circumstances to have this question dealt with by a thoroughly representative Committee. The whole question of the state of our Military Forces requires to be carefully considered. Honorable members will readily recall an incident which occurred last year, when a whole corps in one of the States was disbanded, as the result of action taken by the Government of the day on the reports of responsible officers. An independent, impartial inquiry by a Committee free from all party considerations would be valuable, and would be of service, not only to the men, but to the officers themselves. I fully agree with those who have said that promotion should not be denied to a man in the ranks. At the same time, discipline must be observed, and if a Committee were appointed, as proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corio, it would be able to place on the right shoulders the responsibility for what has occurred. I have no doubt that it will be found in the end that there are faults on both sides.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—I do not propose this afternoon to address myself to the merits of this question, because, in addition to the disability that attaches to me as temporarily representing my honorable colleague the Minister of Defence, the information supplied to me in anticipation of the motion being submitted related to matters upon only one or two of which the honorable and gallant member for Corio has touched. In view of the serious development that has taken place in the course of the debate, it is necessary that I, or some other member of the Government, should be fully equipped, in order to be able to fittingly discuss the several questions that have been broached by the honorable and gallant member. Some of them relate to administration, some to legislation and regulation, and others to matters of policy. The names of individual officers have been mentioned, and they, too, are entitled to a reply. I am quite certain that the strong sympathies of my honorable colleague the Minister of Defence will be with those who have contended in the House for absolute equality of treatment to all ranks of the service, and for a sense of reciprocal obligation among them extending from the highest to the lowest. I propose to call his attention to every matter that has been mentioned during the debate this afternoon. I have also obtained from the honorable and gallant member for Corio a statement of further points in connexion with the regulations, which he desires examined. It seems to me that it would be an advantage to have the new regulations dealt with in the ordinary way—they have to be laid on the table of the House—and placed in the hands of honorable members, in order that they may learn how far any of the objections urged have been already anticipated, and how far the regulations fall short of what is required. Then, when the House resumes the discussion of this question, I hope that the Government will be able to submit a proposal that will meet with the general assent of those who take an interest, as I trust we all do, in the proper development of our citizen forces, and the defences of Australia. I move—

That the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to; debate adjourned.

PENNY POSTAGE.

Mr. LEE (Cowper).—I move—

That, in the opinion of this House, the penny postage system should be extended to all parts of the Commonwealth.

I trust that the motion will commend itself to the House as one that will be received with much satisfaction throughout the Commonwealth. I feel assured that the people will heartily indorse my proposition, and that I shall be able to show, before I resume my seat, that the establishment of a system of penny postage throughout the Commonwealth would not be attended by so great a deficiency in the postal revenue as is estimated by the Department. Honorable members are aware that during the last few years great changes have taken place in the Commonwealth postal system. It is only a few weeks since that the subsidy granted to the Orient Shipping Company for the carriage of our overseas mails was largely increased, and, concurrent with that increase, the postage on letters for the United Kingdom was reduced from 2½d. to 2d. I am unable to say what were the reasons leading to that reduction, but assume that it was thought that—as was the case in connexion with the introduction of penny postage in Victoria—it would result in an increased revenue. Honorable members have also, doubtless, observed the cablegram published in the press a day or two ago, stating that a proposition had been made for universal penny postage, and I trust that the time is not far distant when such a system will be in operation. Meantime, we should at least endeavour to have penny postage throughout the Commonwealth. The whole of the Postal Departments of the States, which in pre-Federation days were under the control of six different Ministers, are now directed by one Minister of the Crown, and the separate systems have given place to absolute uniformity. We have at the head of the Department men whose efficiency is undoubted, and who are called upon in the course of their administration to keep the expenditure as low as possible, consistent with the maintenance of efficiency. It is estimated by the Treasurer that we shall have a surplus of over £400,000 for the financial year 1905, and I hold that, instead of returning the whole of that money—which has been taken out of the pockets of the citizens—to the several States, we should be perfectly justified in devoting at least a portion of it towards making good any deficiency that might arise from the introduction of a system of penny postage throughout the Commonwealth.

Mr. STORRER.—And so cripple the States.

Mr. LEE.—If the money were returned to the States it would be used for educational or other general purposes, and I fail to see why the Commonwealth should not expend at least a part of it in providing increased postal facilities for the people. By popularizing the service, we should increase its usefulness, and probably secure a larger revenue. As an illustration of this, I would point out that at one time a fare of 2d. was charged on the tramway running from Circular Quay to Redfern railway station, Sydney. Deputations waited on the Commissioners times out of number, and asked that the fare should be reduced to 1d., but the reply always forthcoming was that the departmental reports showed that a very serious loss would result from such a reduction. The agitation was maintained, however, and eventually the Commissioners consented to run a penny section. The result was that that section of the tramway service, instead of paying 3 per cent., as before, now yields a return of something like 10 per cent. By reducing the fares, and so popularizing the service, the Commissioners largely increased the revenue derived from it. I hope to be able to show that such would be the result of the extension of the penny postage system to the whole Commonwealth, and that we should therefore be perfectly justified in granting that great concession to the people. Since I gave notice of this motion the Treasurer has delivered his Budget statement, and I presume that honorable members have made themselves familiar with the figures which he then submitted to us. I gather from them that the revenue derived from the postal, telegraphic, and telephone services for the financial year ending June, 1902—the first year for which complete Commonwealth returns can be obtained—was £2,372,861, and that the estimated revenue for the year 1905-6 is £2,682,000, or an increase of £309,139. Turning to the question of expenditure we find that, excluding new works and buildings, the expenditure of this Department for the year ending June, 1902, amounted to £2,430,645, or a sum considerably in excess of the revenue for that period. The estimated expenditure of the Department for the year 1905-6 is £2,656,714, or an increase of £226,069. This large increase will be largely the result of the adoption of the reclassification scheme. The receipts for the year ending June, 1905, were £64,730 in excess of the expenditure of the Department, while the expenditure on new works and buildings amounted to £131,425. If we allow 10 per cent. for interest and depreciation—a margin that should be wide enough to satisfy any Postmaster-General—we have a credit balance of £51,588 on the year's transaction. If we take the estimated receipts and expenditure for the year 1905-6, during which the increased mail subsidy and larger salaries will have to be paid, and also make provision for new works and buildings, which are estimated to cost £217,731, we still have a credit of £3,513.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member is not making any allowance for interest on the capital cost of the postal buildings.

Mr. LEE.—I am allowing 10 per cent. for depreciation, and interest in respect of the capital cost of new works and buildings.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What about the interest on the capital cost of the whole of the postal buildings and appliances?

Mr. LEE.—We have not yet taken them over, and I am therefore allowing only for interest on the capital cost of the new works and buildings erected by the Commonwealth. I have not allowed for the cost of previous years, nor for the properties which have not been taken over by the Commonwealth.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They have been taken over, but the interest is not a charge against the Commonwealth yet.

Mr. LEE.—I wish to show that, by reducing our postage rates, we may expect to increase our revenue, and I must thank the Postmaster-General for having placed certain figures at my disposal in his replies to a series of questions which I asked. It is upon those figures that I base my arguments, and confidently ask the House to give favorable consideration to my motion. In framing my questions, I took a lot of pains to insure that the real facts of the case should be made known; and the replies which I received justify my present action. As honorable members know, Victoria, before Federation, charged 2d. for the carriage of letters throughout the State, though there may have been a 1d. rate in connexion with the deliveries in some of her towns.

Mr. CROUCH.—No; the 2d. rate was universal. There was no special rate for towns.

Mr. LEE.—That makes my argument all the stronger. Just prior to Federation, the Victorian rate was reduced from 2d. to 1d. I do not think that it can be argued that the State is much more thickly populated or much more prosperous now than it was five years ago. The questions which I asked the Postmaster-General, and his replies, were as follow:—

What amount was received in Victoria under the twopenny postage rates for the year prior to the introduction of the penny postage rate?—Estimated postal revenue from sale of stamps used for postage purposes only for the calendar year 1900, £400,837.

Amount received last year under penny postage?—Proceeds of sale of postage stamps, &c., used for postage purposes for the calendar year 1904, £429,880.

Receipts and expenditure for both periods?—Total receipts, 1900, £590,207; total expenditure, 1900, £608,875. Total receipts, 1904, £668,283; total expenditure, 1904, £658,348.

So that while there was a loss of £18,668 on the 2d. rate, in 1904 there was a profit of £9,935 on the 1d. rate; and, taking the Budget figures, there will be a profit for the current year, after making all allowances, of £17,964.

Mr. CAMERON.—What was the loss on the 1d. rate for the first three years during which it was in force?

Mr. LEE.—Not so much as it was under the 2d. rate. I am not asking honorable members to make a leap in the dark; I am asking them to act on the proved facts. With a view to ascertaining to what extent the carriage of letters and papers had increased, I asked the following question, the answer to which will, I think, surprise honorable members, because of the magnitude of the figures:—

Increase in letters posted?—Estimated letters and cards posted in Victoria, 1904, 94,733,350; 1900, 67,563,206; an increase of 27,170,144. The figures for 1900 include all O.H.M.S. correspondence which was then carried free, and also circulars, invoices, &c., enclosed in envelopes and bearing penny stamps.

These figures show that when a service is made cheap it becomes popular, and as facilities for communication increase the revenue of the Department increases. The receipts and expenditure of the States for last year was given as follows:—

	1904-5. Revenue.	1904-5. Expenditure, including new works and buildings.
	£	£
New South Wales ...	980,141	944,645
Victoria ...	682,565	665,303
Queensland ...	331,096	430,782
South Australia ...	266,691	255,225
Western Australia ...	257,489	286,453
Tasmania ...	112,923	115,192
Totals ...	£2,630,905	£2,697,600 or an excess of expenditure over revenue of £66,695—interest not being included in expenditure.

With regard to the Queensland loss, it must be remembered that that State is very large, and her population widely scattered; but she is a coming State, and the number of people who are flocking there will soon convert this loss into a profit.

Mr. CAMERON.—Until we had Federation Tasmania had a surplus.

Mr. LEE.—She has twice had a surplus since Federation, and it must be remembered that at the present time she is paying for her buildings and public works out of revenue.

Mr. CAMERON.—No buildings have been put up there; they will not even give us a clock.

Mr. LEE.—As the hour is nearly 6.30, I should like to be allowed to resume my remarks on another day.

Leave granted; debate adjourned.

Debate resumed from 18th August (vide page 1190), on motion by Mr. KNOX—

That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of the following members:—Sir W. J. Lync, Mr. Lee, Mr. Brown, Mr. Glynn, Mr. Fisher, Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Salmon, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. McWilliams, and the mover.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong). — I desire to thank honorable members for allowing me to continue my speech. Since I tabled my motion for the appointment of a Select Committee the representatives of the Chambers of Commerce of Australia have waited on the Minister of Trade and Customs, who met them very frankly and fairly, and told them that he proposed to make a number of amendments in the Bill, which, I must confess, modify very considerably some of the objections urged against it. I understand that the Minister is unfavorable to the proposal that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and, therefore, I shall have to recapitulate many of the objections urged, in order to support my contention that it is desirable, in the interests of the commercial and trading community, that the measure should be subjected to the closest examination. The Minister indicated to the deputation that he would limit the operation of the Bill to articles intended for human consumption, and to patent medicines.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is where he made a mistake.

Mr. KNOX.—I think the Minister acted very wisely. The objections raised by the commercial community are in no sense attributable to a desire to defeat the objects sought to be achieved by the measure. On the contrary, the members of the commercial community distinctly recognise that a measure that would prevent adulteration and the misuse of trade descriptions would be very serviceable, but the Bill as it stands, in their view, seriously menaces the whole of the commercial interests of the Commonwealth. It is undesirable that a Bill of a highly technical character should be practically redrafted in Committee of the whole House. A number of details requiring the closest consideration will have to be dealt with, and I think that a Select Committee would be in a very much better position to come to just conclusions as to the most effective means of bringing about the desired results. I very much regret that the Minister has not circulated the amendments which he proposes to bring forward. I take it for granted that he will faithfully adhere to the promise he made to the deputation representing the Chambers of Commerce, and that he will submit his amendments in due course. One of the main objections to the Bill is that the standardization of goods which appears to be contemplated can properly be carried out only by experts. Ministers have spoken with two voices upon this subject. The Attorney-General has expressed the opinion that standardization is not contemplated, whereas the Minister in charge of the measure holds the view that there must be a distinct indication by way of brand or description of the value or quality of the goods. Another objection to the measure is that it will place it within the power of the Customs authorities to refuse to admit goods into the Commonwealth unless certain trade secrets are divulged. This is a particularly dangerous provision, and surely those who are likely to be most seriously affected should have an opportunity to make the fullest representations to a Select Committee. I have here statements which have been prepared by the members of the Chambers of Commerce after mature deliberation. The members of these bodies are deeply concerned in the proposed legislation, have a special knowledge of the subject dealt with, and are actuated by no other desire than that the trade of the Commonwealth should be sustained at a high level.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Could not their arguments be submitted for the consideration of this Committee?

Mr. KNOX.—I am sure that the honorable and learned member will recognise the difficulty of practically redrafting a Bill in a Committee of the whole House. Such a process is likely to result in a number of conflicting provisions, which will probably lead to serious trouble.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If necessary, the Bill could be referred back to the draftsman for reconstruction.

Mr. KNOX.—I still hold the opinion that a Select Committee could most effectively deal with a highly technical Bill of this character. I must confess that it is with a considerable amount of hesitation that I ask honorable members to add another to the already large number of Select Committees and Commissions. I do not wish to in any way to relieve Ministers of their responsibilities; but it is imperative that the measure should be considered line by line and clause by clause, in order to insure full justice, and to preclude the possibility of inflicting injury where we desire only to confer advantage. I now propose to read the opinions regarding the Bill which have been expressed by the Sydney Chamber of Commerce. That body says—

The Chamber would hail with satisfaction a well considered measure safeguarding the public health and applied to food and drugs, but as these are already provided for here, and possibly in other States, by legislation, we cannot see the necessity for any such Act as the present one. It is evident, from the list of goods stated by Sir William Lyne as being most likely to be affected by the Act, that the measure is not to be regarded as one to safeguard health, but that it is one which affects all classes of the trading community. In their opinion the Commerce Bill travels too far, and in its possible restrictions might very injuriously be used, and seriously embarrass the operations of both importers and exporters.

In the next place, if such an Act is considered necessary in the public interests, we think it should embrace all trade operations, and not deal with imports and exports only, leaving manufacturers and producers in Australia severely alone in their transactions between States of the Commonwealth.

In passing, I may inform the House that if this motion be defeated I shall feel justified in endeavouring in Committee to make the Bill applicable to local productions, as well as to exports and imports.

Mr. WATSON. — We cannot deal with goods which are not exported beyond the borders of the States.

Mr. KNOX. — I am sure that the honorable member will admit that we are quite entitled to deal with trade between the States. If the Government persist in pressing this Bill forward, I shall attempt to make its provisions applicable to Inter-State trade and commerce, as well as to foreign trade and commerce. Surely the sense of fairness entertained by honorable members will prevent them from making the measure apply exclusively to external trade. The protest of the Sydney Chamber of Commerce proceeds—

It is only when a manufacturer or producer becomes an exporter to countries beyond the Commonwealth that he comes within the provisions of the Bill, which is entitled "An Act relating to commerce with other countries."

Seeing that the measure, if passed into an Act, is to be "incorporated and read as one with the Customs Act 1901," it appears possible to have been designed as a "drag-net" to give extended powers to the Customs never anticipated or authorized by Parliament when the Customs Act 1901 was passed.

The main effects of the measure, if passed into an Act, will primarily be to harass importers, and, secondly, producers and manufacturers when they wish to become exporters.

I regret very much that I am compelled to trespass upon the patience of honorable members, but I feel that this subject is so important that I am justified in placing these protests upon the permanent records of the House. The report continues—

Clause 7, sub-section 1.—The Governor-General may, by proclamation, prohibit the importation or introduction into Australia of any goods specified in the proclamation unless there is applied to them "a trade description of such character relating to such matters, and applied in such manner as is prescribed by the proclamation or by regulations."

In addition to the very wide powers sought to be conferred on the Governor-General by proclamation, there is the insidious and dangerous (judging by past experience) power by regulation.

If we turn to the definition of a trade description we find—"Trade description," in relation to any goods, means any description, statement, indication, or suggestion, direct or indirect—

- (a) as to the nature, number, quantity, quality, purity, class, grade, measure, gauge, size, or weight of the goods; or
- (b) as to the country or place in or at which the goods were made or produced; or
- (c) as to the manufacturer or producer of the goods or the person by whom they were selected, packed, or in any way prepared for the market; or
- (d) as to the mode of manufacturing, producing, selecting, packing, or otherwise preparing the goods; or
- (e) as to the material or ingredients of which the goods are composed, or from which they are derived; or
- (f) as to the goods being the subject of an existing patent, privilege, or copyright, and includes a Customs entry relating to goods; and any mark which, according to the custom of the trade or common repute, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters, shall be deemed to be a trade description within the meaning of this Act.

The definitions, "direct or indirect," under (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), are full enough, one would think, but are added to by the inclusion of "a Customs entry relating to goods," and, further, "any mark, &c., shall be deemed a trade description within the meaning of this Act."

On any one of the above items a proclamation could be issued, or regulations promulgated—but this is not sufficiently drastic; it is made to include any description, statement, indication, or suggestion, direct or indirect, in connexion therewith.

It is clearly evident that almost any article could be prohibited on one or other of the above grounds, and that in the hands of a Minister with such powers of restriction, importations of a most ordinary nature could be forced to prohibition.

Then, further, in passing an entry, an importer is faced with a false trade description.

"False Trade Description" means a trade description which, by reason of anything contained therein, or omitted therefrom, is false or likely to mislead, in a material respect, as regards the goods to which it is applied, and includes every alteration of a trade description, whether by way of addition, effacement, or otherwise, which makes the description false or likely to mislead in a material respect.

In the majority of instances it is impossible for an importer to know of his own knowledge, say, for instance, the "measure" or "purity," the "country" or "place" in or at which goods were made, by whom they were selected and packed, the "material" or "ingredients." Yet any error or omission under clause 8 renders an importer liable to a fine of £100, or three months' imprisonment, under clause 260 of the Customs Act 1901.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — All the description has to be included in the entry.

Mr. KNOX. — Exactly. The report continues—

It is, however, provided in the same section—"It shall be a defence to a prosecution for an offence against this section if the defendant proves that he did not knowingly import the goods in contravention of this section."

But the onus of proof is on the defendant, and under the Customs Act 1901, with which this measure has to be read, the proof must be to the satisfaction of the Customs. That is a most difficult task at the best of times, but under certain conditions it is absolutely impossible.

We must now refer again to clause 7. Sub-section 2 provides for forfeiture. Sub-section 3 says—

"Subject to the regulations, the Comptroller-General, or on appeal from him, the Minister, may permit any goods which are liable to be, or have been, seized as forfeited under this section, to be delivered to the owner or importer upon security being given to the satisfaction of the Comptroller-General that the prescribed trade description will be applied to the goods, or that they will be forthwith exported."

We do not know what regulations there may be, but the Council see grave objections to putting the terms of the "trade description" as applied to a particular article in the hands of the Comptroller-General.

I know that the commercial community have the utmost confidence in the present Comptroller-General. At the same time, the entire trading community feels that this is an enormous power to place in the hands of one officer, no matter who he may be. I have now dealt with the objections by the Sydney Chamber of Commerce to the provisions of the Bill so far as imports are concerned. In regard to exports—

The Council fear that under clause 5, which provides that an officer shall inspect and examine all prescribed goods; and clause 6, which provides that notice of intention to export must be given, the export trade will be seriously hampered, and the expenses incurred in the supervision for carrying out the provisions of the Act will fall very heavily on the producing interests of the State.

These expressions of opinion emanate from men who have most carefully considered the probable effect of this Bill. They say—

If the provisions of the Act mean that the goods have to be graded prior to export, no provision has been made for the appointment of graders or for their emolument, nor has any charge been authorized on the exporter; but, perhaps, all this will be attended to under the sweeping conditions of clause 14—miscellaneous. Certainly producers ought to be apprised of the intentions of the Government under the clause in question.

Merchants feel that the drastic provisions of this Bill must react upon the great producing interests of Australia. If these coercive conditions are imposed upon merchants, the latter must pass them on to the producers, and consequently the whole community must inevitably suffer. They add—

A curious anomaly seems to exist in connexion with sub-section 3 of clause 7, and sub-section 3 of clause 10. Under the former, goods imported and seized as being prohibited exported. In the latter, goods prohibited not be exported. Clause 15 states—

Whoever knowingly aids and abets shall be deemed to have committed an offence, and shall be punished accordingly.

An indentor, ship-owner, drayman, or clerk, all might assist in importing a prohibited article unknowingly, but the onus of proof on accused, they will, under the Customs Act 1901, have to prove their innocence.

Having dealt with the disabilities in the measure generally, let us turn to the question of inspection. We find, first, that under this Bill any officer of Customs may inspect and examine "all prohibited goods." It is clear that such a work must be carried out only by an expert. Clause 3 of clause 5, however, places enormous powers in the hands of the officers of the Department. It is pointed out by the Chamber of Commerce that—

We fancy under the Customs Act, any article at any rate on shore, would require a licence for breaking into a store—it does not seem to be here.

Clause 6. Notice of intention to export could only work to the detriment of export. This is a series of well-thought-out objections by the Sydney Chamber of Commerce, and surely it is too much to ask of honorable members to deal with those objections, and to attempt in Committee to cast the Bill as to give satisfaction to all parties. I come now to the position taken up by the Melbourne Chamber of Commerce. That Chamber devoted many hours to consideration of the Bill, and drew a series of objections to its provisions. They hold that it would be detrimental to the trade and commerce of this State. Clause 5 and 7 are, in their opinion, in the nature of new legislation, but the remainder of the Bill is similar to the Merchandise Bill, and there is no objection to it. It was felt by the Chamber that—

Under clause 3 it would be absolutely impossible for an importer to give the details required from A to F, and it would appear that many pitfalls are provided for traders; and the object to the effect of this Bill, which is to standardize goods.

Mr. PAGE.—Where do the people come in who have to buy the rubbish that is offered for sale?

Mr. KNOX.—The interjection made by the honorable member shows that it is absolutely impossible for him to deal with the details of this Bill. I am not giving the opinions of responsible men who come to the House, not with paltry tions, but with weighty arguments advanced as the result of the experience of a lifetime in the trade and commerce of Australia.

Mr. PAGE.—I am one of those who take an interest in the position of the consumer.

Mr. KNOX.—I agree that it is necessary that we should protect the interests of the consumer, and I would remind the honorable member that not one of the propositions made by the various Chambers of Commerce would interfere in any way with the carrying out of that object.

Mr. PAGE.—Who elects the members of the Chambers of Commerce?

Mr. KNOX.—They are elected by the merchants.

Mr. PAGE.—They elect themselves.

Mr. KNOX.—It is pointed out that—

According to the Interpretations Act, any regulation or proclamation will require two months' notice; this was considered quite inadequate, as a sailing vessel often takes from three to four months to come from England, and we would suggest that six months' notice of regulation or proclamation should be given.

The Minister of Trade and Customs met the deputation which waited upon him in the fairest manner possible, and admitted that this suggestion was reasonable, and that he would give it the most careful consideration—

No proclamation or regulation should take effect in respect of orders placed or shipped before the issue of such proclamation. It is often necessary to place orders twelve months or more before execution. It is felt it would be a hardship to ask any manufacturer to divulge the secret of his manufacture, and to guard against this as much as possible, we think that any patent medicine or other compound, unless proved to be deleterious, should not be subject to description. In answer to our objection to being governed by proclamation and regulations, it is urged by departmental officers that this Act was much more elastic under such rule, and that any mistaken regulation would be upset by Parliament. How this could be done when Parliament was not sitting does not appear.

If the Parliament were not in session, it would be impossible to give effect to alterations made, with a view of preventing any improper interference with trade and commerce in respect of various goods—

Analysis:—It was argued that the importer should have the right to have the goods analyzed, and that in case of a difference between his analyst and a Customs analyst a third should be appointed as arbitrator. Should not some amendment of clause 14 be made in this direction?

It should not be left in the hands of a man who might have no expert knowledge—who might know nothing of the character and quality of the material with which he was called upon to deal—to give an arbitrary declaration of opinion. The work should be intrusted to an expert, and, if his decision were considered unsatisfactory, it should be open to the importer concerned to submit the matter to arbitration—

A Customs entry could be deemed a trade description. Wool adulterated with cotton would be entered as "wool," but would be a false description. How can this be reconciled.

Honorable members are aware that for certain purposes cotton has been, and is being, used in conjunction with wool.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Even in Australia.

Mr. KNOX.—I am dealing at present with the matter from the point of view of the importer. If a bill of entry stated that certain goods, consisting of an admixture of cotton and wool, were woollen goods, the importer would be subjected to heavy penalties under this Bill, although he might have no knowledge of the admixture.

Mr. FISHER.—What is the objection to stating the quantity of cotton in so-called woollen goods?

Mr. KNOX.—I do not know what objection there may be, but I would point out that in order to comply with the provisions of this measure merchants and importers would have to engage a whole army of officers. If their expenses were increased in that way, the consumer—about whom my honorable friend is so anxious—would have to pay.

Mr. PAGE.—If the honorable member went into a shop to buy a woollen shirt, he would not expect to be supplied with a cotton one.

Mr. KNOX.—I certainly should not. Another objection taken by the Chamber relates to the cost of administration. It is pointed out by them that—

A large number of graders and inspectors would have to be appointed at very considerable expense.

I know that the Minister replied to the deputation which waited upon him, that in his opinion the present staff of officers would be able to undertake all the additional work imposed upon the Department by this measure. They might be able to do so, if the limitations which the Minister promised were imposed. If this work is to be done at all, however, it should be done well, and in order to carry it out effectively, it would be necessary to have

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not propose to re-draft the Bill. I have only said that I thought of proposing an amendment.

Mr. KNOX.—Yes; but I have shown how numberless are the objections to the measure on the part of the community. The object of the motion is not to secure delay, but merely to enable a more workable measure to be passed. The proceedings of the Select Committee would be expeditious and inexpensive. It could report within a very short time.

Mr. PAGE.—How soon?

Mr. KNOX.—An effective report could be made to the House within three weeks.

Mr. PAGE.—If the honorable member could guarantee that the Committee would report in three weeks, I would vote for the motion.

Mr. KNOX.—Within three weeks the whole Bill can be gone through, and the objections to it set out seriatim. Men are prepared to come from Brisbane, Sydney, and Adelaide to explain the practical reasons why certain of its clauses should not be enacted. I earnestly ask the Minister not to consider that the motion has been moved to cause unnecessary delay, but to believe that our object is to obtain a workable measure which, while benefiting the community at large, will not seriously hamper the trade and commerce of the States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—Ordinarily I should consider that there are enough Select Committees now in existence; but I submit that the honorable member for Kooyong has made out a good case for adding another to the number. If there ever was a Bill in regard to which the investigations of a Committee would do good, this is such a Bill. It is a great misfortune that honorable members do not really understand its provisions, although two Ministers have laboured to explain them. We are particularly in the dark as to why the additional powers which are asked for are required. When we urge that they are too drastic we are told by the Attorney-General that equally drastic powers are contained in the Customs Act, and, as the first clause of the measure incorporates it with the Customs Act, so that it must be read as part of that Act, one wonders why the Government ask for these additional powers. If they already possess more drastic powers for the prohibition and regulation of importations, why are they proposing to add another needless statute to the many by which this poor Australia of ours is now afflicted. I venture to assert that these additional powers are not being asked for only to protect the health of the community, and the prevention of the loss of life which we are told is occasioned by the use of deleterious foods and drugs, but that there is another motive operating which we have yet to hear from the mouth of the Minister, or, if the measure becomes law, to perceive from his subsequent actions. But regarding the Bill as a bond fide attempt to deal with certain matters which require regulation, I think, in view of the conflicting statements of the Ministers who have tried to explain its provisions and its far-reaching effect, there should be some inquiry as to the views held in regard to it by those who are most interested in its passage, or who will be most seriously affected by it. I am at a loss to understand why the Government should object to refer the measure to a Select Committee, because it was only this afternoon that the Minister of Trade and Customs withdrew, on behalf of the Attorney-General, a notice of motion for the appointment of a Committee of Trade, Commerce, and Industries—

To sit and act at any time during the continuance of Parliament, and to take into their consideration all matters pertaining to the general development and welfare of the Commonwealth as a whole, including trade, commerce, agriculture and its kindred industries, manufactures, population, and defence, and any matter referred to them by either House of Parliament. I understood the Minister's reason for withdrawing the notice of motion to be that the Government hope to attain the object in another way, which he did not explain.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That motion was given notice of by the Attorney-General as a private member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes, but when I took exception to his moving it as a private member he would not withdraw it, and it was only withdrawn on the explanation of the Minister of Trade and Customs that the Government propose to take these powers in another way. If the Government believe in the appointment of a Committee of this kind, what harm can they see in this proposal to refer the Bill to a similar Committee?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not say that I believed in the exercise of these powers.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister, in withdrawing the motion, said that he did so because it was under the consideration of the Government whether the same end could not be reached by other means.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Not the same end.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I shall not labour the point; but those who are most interested in trade and commerce join in asking for the proposed investigation. I wish to make one or two observations in support of the proposal of the honorable member for Kooyong. First of all, I should like to refer to some of the statements made by the Minister in charge of the Bill. He declares that it is his intention to compel the exporters of produce to mark it correctly; that is to say, that they shall mark their butter as excellent or inferior, their fruit as superior or inferior, and other produce similarly, according to quality, weight, size, and grade. That also is the definition of the Bill given to us by the Attorney-General. He said that it was deemed necessary to insure that all goods going out of the country should have the truth told regarding their weight, size, quality, and grade. I want to know whether that is not grading in its very essence. If exporters are to be required, not only to mark their goods, but to comply with a prescribed standard, they will have to practically grade them. If the Minister insists upon the goods being marked, according to the standard which he is to lay down, I contend that that will amount to grading. Yet the Minister of Trade and Customs and the Attorney-General quibble over the question. When we asked plainly whether the Government intended to adopt a system of grading, we were told that that all depended upon what was meant by grading. Ministers informed us that they intended to make exporters mark their goods, but they did not say that they intended to prescribe the standard according to which such goods should be marked. Importers are to be required to mark their goods according to the place of production, and the ingredients contained in them. That is to say, the proprietors of any trade secrets will be required to disclose them to the Customs Department. I think that it is reprehensible on the part of the Government to attempt to impose any such conditions upon importers or exporters. It should be the first duty of the Government to protect patentees, and certainly they should not require them to disclose their secrets of manufacture to any Government official, no matter how highly placed or trustworthy he may be. A trade secret ought to be regarded as sacred. If the Government are going to force these secrets from the safe-keeping of the manufacturers, they should go a step further, and abrogate all our patent laws. Of what use will a patent be to a manufacturer if he has to divulge his trade secrets to Government officials? It is all very well to say that the Customs officials will be placed under a bond of secrecy, and that the strictest possible safeguards will be afforded against any breach of faith, but I venture to say that, if once trade secrets are communicated to Government officials, they will certainly leak out, in spite of all that may be done to prevent it. A far-reaching power of this description ought to be carefully safeguarded, and those who are most directly interested should have an opportunity of being heard before any such conditions are forced upon them.

Mr. FISHER.—What about the public?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am just as much concerned about protecting the public as is the honorable member. May I point out that, according to the great protectionist panjandrum, the Age, the cardinal principle of protectionism is to look after the producer, and to leave the consumer to look after himself. The Government are now proposing to act right in the teeth of that protectionist tenet. The Age says that those who subscribe to the free-trade doctrine look after the consumers, and leave the producers to look after themselves, whereas protectionists look after the producers, and leave the consumers to look after themselves.

Mr. CHANTER.—Does not the Age say that the interests of both producers and consumers should be studied?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No. If the honorable member will read the article to which I refer he will find that the position is just as I have stated it. This Bill does not trouble about the producer, but looks after the interests of the consumer, and therefore is anathema to the Age. The honorable member for Kooyong pointed out very clearly that whilst importers were proposed to be placed under a ban, no attention was to be paid to our producers at home. If we are to study the interests of the consumer, whatever we may do by way of restriction, regulation, and control, and by way of standardization in the case of outsiders should also be applied to the goods which are consumed at home.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member knows that there is a difficulty in the way.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not as to Inter-State commerce. There may be some difficulty with regard to trade carried on within a State. That leads me to another point, namely, whether we should take this matter under our Federal consideration, seeing that the States Governments have already brought certain machinery into operation with a view to exercising supervision over food and other products. That is one of my objections to this Bill. We have at hand in the various States the means of doing precisely what is proposed to be achieved under the Bill. We have our Health Acts of various kinds and our Health Departments to see that the goods that are consumed by the community are pure and unadulterated. Why should we double-bank our legislation in the way proposed? I contend that we cannot interfere in these matters as effectively as the States authorities can.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Bill will apply only to goods imported or exported from the States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am quite aware of that, and I am pointing out the anomaly of the whole proposal. It is proposed to interfere with goods passing beyond a State, and therefore to interfere with the manufacture of all classes of goods; that is, unless it is assumed that manufacturers will produce one article for export and another article for home consumption. It would scarcely pay them in most cases to do that, and, therefore, in effect, it is proposed to interfere with the manufacture of all articles. That is my objection to the Bill. Whatever could be accomplished by this Bill could be performed much more effectively by the States authorities. They are on the spot, have local knowledge, and have gained experience as to the details of manufacture and production, and therefore know infinitely better than a Minister sitting outside all the States what to do in the way of restriction and control. I am not sure that we are entitled to interfere with the police powers of the States. At any rate, the matter is one for inquiry. In connexion with the exercise of these police powers by the States, there now exists something akin to prohibition. A conference of fruit-growers recently met in Melbourne and complained that the authorities in Western Australia had prohibited the importation of fruit from the other States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They do not prohibit the importation of fruit, but merely insist upon close inspection.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The inspection is so rigid that fruit cannot be imported.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Oh, yes; large quantities of fruit are sent there from the Eastern States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The charges levied upon importers of fruit are so heavy as to be almost prohibitive.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is libellous. The Western Australian authorities are merely seeking to keep out the codlin moth and other fruit pests or diseases.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Some time ago I inquired into the charges and restrictions imposed in Western Australia in connexion with the importation of fruit, and I found that what with one charge and another—inspectorial charges, wharfage charges, and others—the shipment of fruit to Western Australia was rendered unprofitable. I ascertained these particulars from the inspector in Western Australia, whose scale of charges amounted to a sum almost prohibitive. Hence very little fruit is sent from the Eastern States to Western Australia, and then only at certain seasons of the year. The proposed Committee could do good work in connexion with the investigation of this and kindred subjects, with a view to devising means of bringing about equality of administration and that freedom of trade between the States which was contemplated by the Constitution. Although the Constitution provides for free intercourse as to trade and commerce between the States, some of the States, by the exercise of their police powers, are prohibiting the introduction of perishable products from other States. There is another reason why I think the Minister should not have conferred upon him the large powers sought in the Bill. It is proposed that the Minister should have placed in his hands the power to prohibit the importation of certain goods if they do not bear certain trade descriptions which he alone is to prescribe. That would practically give him unlimited power.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—And the burden of proof would be thrown on the person charged.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the Bill were passed in its present form it would place the Minister of Trade and Customs in the position of a Czar of Commerce. I am not prepared to make the present Minister a Czar in matters of commerce, or anything else. In the harvester case, the Minister, without one word of warning, or calling upon the importers to show cause, increased the price of machines by an arbitrary act, and under the powers proposed to be conferred by the Bill he might proceed to the extent of totally prohibiting the introduction of many articles of commerce which are now imported. In a word, the Minister would have the sole right to apply prohibitive protection to Australia at his own will and pleasure. Such a power should not be conferred upon any Minister, no matter how good or trustworthy. We might as well have no Parliament if the Minister is to be placed in such a position. The Attorney-General stated that he would not object to provide that the regulations framed under the Act should be presented to Parliament; but the Minister for Trade and Customs does not say anything of the kind. He is endeavouring to whittle away all that he has previously stated, and to remove the impressions which he conveyed to various deputations. He has told us that he will make only one amendment in the Bill, and no one can pretend that a solitary alteration is all that is necessary to meet the requirements of the case. In plain English, the Minister is not going to do very much by way of alteration. If the powers proposed are conferred upon the Minister, the effect upon trade and commerce will be very serious. It is all very well for the Minister to say that he is going to make producers tell the truth about the goods they send out of this country. It will be hard to do that, and I venture to say that the very doing of it will be a hardship to those to whom the provision is intended to apply, not because they do not tell the truth, and not because they are not trading honestly. For instance, I was told by an Eastern merchant that if this Bill be passed it will absolutely ruin his trade. There is, I understand, a big trade done with the East in the way of tinned butter, which is usually put up in 1-lb. tins. This gentleman points out that the Eastern mind is very conservative, and very suspicious, and unless we can give the people there the same tins, marked in the same way as those from other parts of the world, they will decline to trade with us.

Mr. MALONEY.—If we give them good weight, they will very soon find it out.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am assured that, if we alter the tins in any way, they will decline to trade with us at all. Take biscuits as another illustration. I understand that all biscuits exported to the East are put up in 2-lb. tins. As honorable members are aware, some biscuits weigh more than others, but, to suit the Eastern mind, we have to use the same-sized tins for all biscuits. The difference in the weight of them is regulated in their price. But in the East the measure must be the same in all cases. I am told that the ordinary Chinese has no knowledge whatever of weights. He goes by measurements, and unless we can give him the same-sized tin every time he will decline to trade with us. These are the statements made to me by a reputable Eastern merchant—

Mr. BAMFORD.—They are very thin.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I venture to say that the word of a reputable merchant should be accepted. Does the honorable member entertain any doubt as to this gentleman's veracity?

Mr. MALONEY.—I have my doubts about it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have not any.

Mr. MALONEY.—The average Easterner—and especially the Chinese—is more than the equal of the white man in matters of commerce.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I know that that is so in some respects and within certain limitations. But he has become so accustomed to measurement that he will not have anything to do with weight at all. I say that these men are entitled to be heard. We know nothing whatever about the Eastern trade, and they do. Ought we not to endeavour to profit by their knowledge? They allege that if we legislate as we propose, we shall be doing so ignorantly, and to the disaster of their trade.

Mr. CHANTER.—Does the honorable member approve of selling 14 ozs. for a pound?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not. This is a Bill for destroying trade, and not for regulating it in these particulars. The trading community do not object to the marking of a tin, or to its ingredients being known, if their competitors in other parts of the world have to subscribe to similar conditions. But, so far as I am aware, there is no legislation which goes as far as does this measure.

Mr. THOMAS.—Is that an objection to it?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is an argument in favour of inquiry before it is passed. All I ask is that there shall be an inquiry into this matter, and that the people whose trade will be affected by the operation of the Bill shall be heard. That is a reasonable request to make to the Minister. These men declare that the Bill will ruin their businesses.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — Nonsense. The gentleman to whom the honorable member refers approached me upon the subject. The Bill does not alter the size of the tins.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I believe that the merchant to whom I allude has been to the Minister, who led him to believe that he had every sympathy for him. At the same time the Minister told him that he was not going to make many alterations in the measure.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—He went away from me quite satisfied.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then I am afraid that the Minister hypnotised him, because he is very dissatisfied now. Whilst other communities endeavour to cater to the prejudices and customs of Eastern races, we propose to cut right across them by legislation.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Will the honorable member show me where the Bill alters the size of the tins?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes. It provides that a trade description is to apply to the nature, number, quality, quantity, purity, class, grade, measure, gauge, size or weight of the goods.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There is no alteration of the size of the tins provided for there.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does not that provision compel a merchant to declare what his tins contain?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; but it will not alter the size of the tins, or their colour, or the paper upon them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If we alter the size of the tins in any way, even by stamping the weight on them, the Eastern races will not look at them. The least that the Minister can do is to hear these merchants upon their oath, and to weigh their statements. Instead of doing that, he proposes to make standards in the case of all these goods. Although we cannot get the Minister to say that this is a grading Bill, its provisions enable him to establish standards in connexion with all our produce. I venture to say, with very great respect, that his officers do not possess the requisite knowledge to enable them to prescribe those standards. They know nothing about the Eastern trade or its requirements.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Surely the honorable member does not suppose that the Department is foolish enough to endeavour to destroy the Eastern trade?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not suppose that it would do so willingly, but I am afraid that it will do so ignorantly.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Trust the Department.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I should think we ought to be very careful to what extent we trust the Department, after the McKay incident. If we are to extend a prohibition to goods, let it be after that prohibition has been placed upon the statute-book. Do not let us give the Minister of Trade and Customs power by Executive act to open or shut the ports of Australia. I repeat that there is no parallel to this Bill. We have been told that it has been taken largely from the Merchandise Marks Act of Great Britain. But I would point out that that Act does not interfere with the size, quality, measure, and gauge of goods.

Mr. THOMAS.—It ought to; that is all.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. That is a very good sentiment, to come from a free-trader like the honorable member.

Mr. THOMAS.—I believe in providing for the proper weight, size, and quality of goods.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is not the question. This is a question of whether we shall ignorantly interfere with the relations of traders. It is a good old principle, which has worked well for thousands of years, that when a man buys an article, he takes the risk of making a good bargain. In this case, however, it is proposed to set up a standard for him. I claim that we are going beyond the legitimate functions of Parliament by interfering in such a way. If the Government will give us the Merchandise Marks Act of Great Britain, we shall not object. That Act interferes with imports only to the extent of providing that they shall show what is the country and place of their origin. If that measure were applied to the Commonwealth, it would not be permissible to mark goods made in Australia and sent to Germany as having been "made in Germany." Its object is to prevent fraud on the consumer. That is an object which we might very well seek to achieve; but when we interfere in all the details of a man's business, when we seek to compel him to reveal his trade secrets, to say how he makes up certain compounds, what are the contents of each case that he sends away, and what is the size, shape, gauge, and measure of his packages, we go beyond anything that has ever been done, either in European countries or anywhere else.

Mr. THOMAS.—We are a progressive people.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It seems to me that we are progressing backwards. This is a retrograde step, such as I venture to say will make us a laughing-stock in the eyes of the trading community of the world.

Mr. THOMAS.—We have heard that before.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is useless to argue with the honorable member, because he is not open to conviction. That was not always his attitude, but now all that he can do is to barrack for the Government. I congratulate the Ministry on having so subservient a supporter. When he was a supporter of Governments with which I was associated, he used to be very critical, and now and again was heard to express his opinions, but he seems to have been struck dumb ever since the present Administration came into office. He can do nothing more than interject, while members of the Opposition are speaking. Proposals that are an outrage on his life-long principles are submitted week after week to the House, and we find him supporting them. I congratulate my honorable friend on his new views, but am afraid that his political perspective is becoming a little awry.

Mr. THOMAS.—I have heard the honorable member talk differently.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I repeat that the powers which this Bill will confer on the Minister of Trade and Customs are altogether too great. There is not the requisite knowledge in the Department to enable them to be exercised prudently and safely. The Bill will strike a blow at the commerce of Australia. It will do more injury to the true interests of the Commonwealth than can be counterbalanced by any act on the part of the Governments of the States. If we cannot interfere for the purpose of assisting the States to their own betterment and welfare, do not let us keep meddling with a view of undoing the good they are accomplishing in their own local spheres. Let us leave them alone in regard to matters affecting the health, safety, and moral welfare of the people. The States Governments are on the spot. They have the necessary machinery, and can do the work better than we can, because they have a larger experience in these matters than we could possibly possess. I repeat that we ought to leave them alone. All that I am asking for, so far as this Bill is concerned, is that the people outside who will be so profoundly affected by it—whose businesses, fortunes, interests, and livelihood are in jeopardy—shall at least be heard before we proceed to take the drastic steps which they assert will lead to disaster and, in many cases, crush them out of existence.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—I think that some of the interjections which we have heard during the debate—and especially those made by the honorable member for Maranoa, the honorable member for Wide Bay, and the honorable member for Barrier—make it abundantly clear that the intention and the effect of this measure are not fully realized. I am not surprised at this, because the Minister in charge of the Bill failed, when introducing it, to enlighten the House either as to its scope or as to the intention of the Ministry in regard to the exercise of the powers which it would confer on them. Another point is that we have had different opinions expressed by three different Ministers in regard to the intentions of the Bill. One Minister said that it was absolutely absurd to suppose that grading of any description was intended; another declined to say whether or not such was the case, while the Minister of Trade and Customs stated that it was intended that grading should be carried out to a certain extent, but that the system was not to be fully observed.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I said that true descriptions would be required.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The truth of the description is to be determined by examining the quality of the goods, and by fixing certain departmental standards.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Has the honorable member read what is being done at present under the Victorian Act?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I have a copy of the Victorian Act, and am acquainted with its provisions.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And I have a statement as to the full working of the Act.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Does the honorable gentleman say that the Ministry propose to duplicate the work carried out under the Victorian Act? If that is the intention, why does he seek to take such large powers as the Bill would confer upon him? The question has often been put, "Why not protect the consumer." I quite agree that the consumer should be protected from dishonest trade practices. But this Bill does not provide any means to protect him. It will still be possible under it to introduce into the Commonwealth adulterated foods and the most deleterious of articles.

Mr. THOMAS.—Then the honorable member should move an amendment to render such practices impossible.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Minister said that he had abandoned the provisions of a more drastic measure, which he found in his Department when he took office.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And the honorable member is complaining of the provisions of a less drastic measure.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I shall deal with that point presently. The honorable gentleman says that he has abandoned the provisions of a more drastic Bill. What was the intention of those provisions? I am not advocating that measure, because it was merely a departmental Bill which had not undergone the criticism of the Cabinet, but the intention of it was that a certain standard should be fixed, and that certain—but not all—goods, where the departure from standard would make them useless for their purpose, should be absolutely prevented from entering the Commonwealth, and also from being exported. For instance, manures which might be so adulterated as to be useless for their purpose might have been prevented under that Bill from coming into Australia. And so with leather loaded with deleterious chemicals.

Mr. THOMAS.—But, according to the honorable member for Parramatta, that would be an interference with the right of the person purchasing the goods.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am not dealing with that question; I am simply indicating the provisions of the departmental Bill. The Bill now before us abandons those provisions, although one would gather from the interjections of some honorable members that such was not the case. It is proposed by this Bill to enforce true descriptions. I do not object to that. It is desirable that any description of goods should be a true one. But this measure goes beyond that, and is really dangerous. A trade description is not merely to be true; a whole shipment of goods may be stopped and forfeited unless the trade in which they bear, in addition to being true, complies with the description framed by the Minister of the day. That is the remarkable feature of the measure, and it is one which honorable members have not fully appreciated. The whole of the commerce of Australia is to be gripped in this way. Before taking such a step, we should very seriously consider the matter. I believe that some samples of so-called leather have been shown in the House to-night. I would point out, however, that the importation of such leather would not be prohibited under this Bill.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The importers would have to correctly describe it.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—They could describe it as "pasteboard" or "imitation leather"; but that would not prevent it being made up into boots and sold in that form to the general community as freely as at the present time. How can it be said, therefore, that this Bill will protect the consumer? It will afford him absolutely no protection.

Mr. THOMAS.—It is about time that he had some protection.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—No effectual protection can be afforded him unless the matter is taken in hand by the States.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The States could not deal with it through the Customs.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—They could prevent deleterious goods reaching the consumer, and that is what the Department of Trade and Customs cannot do.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It can.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If the honorable gentleman is familiar with the provisions of the Bill, he must know that under it the so-called leather which was exhibited to-night could be entered by its true name, passed through the Customs, and distributed among the boot factories just as if such a measure never existed.

Mr. FISHER.—But we should be able to tell what quantity of that material was coming in.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That can be ascertained at the present time.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It will be under this Bill.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member administers the Customs Act, and if he can prevent these goods from entering, why does he not do so?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Such goods could be made up here and sent to New South Wales.

D THOMSON.—That is requiring that trade desmerely true, but as is a most extraordinary trade description as a member of insertion

to ensure the

all the

be imposed as the

did not accept the Minister might, as it is as a descriptionable not merely to transportation, but to absolutely. Consequently the whole trade from Kamschatka to South Africa would be called upon to bow to the whim of the Minister of Trade and Customs in Australia, or else goods, notwithstanding that they bore truthful descriptions sanctioned by long custom, might be forfeited on being landed in Australia.

The provision is a most extreme one.

Further than that, the penalties provided for in the Bill are exceedingly drastic. The Minister has referred to the Victorian Act, some of whose provisions are similar to those of this measure; but although penalties are provided for, accompanied with non-permission to export goods which do not fulfil the conditions, that measure does not go nearly so far as to provide forfeiture of shipments. But because of the aptitude of a Department to adopt the most drastic measures, this Bill provides, not only that a departure from the truth,

but any flaw in a description, or any variation from a style of description required by the Minister, may cause the forfeiture of a shipment. These facts show how carefully the Bill must be examined, and, in my opinion, the request of the honorable member for Kooyong for the appointment of a Select Committee is only reasonable.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—To destroy the Bill.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Minister has very little faith in the measure if he thinks that to let in a little light upon it will destroy it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I shall not permit it to be blocked, as the amendment of the Tariff has been blocked by the free-traders

by the appointment of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Minister's remark shows that he is afraid that the Bill cannot stand fair criticism.
Here is another point which shows what a tremendous engine we are asked to create to obtain very poor results. The Bill will roll over the whole of our imports and exports like a Juggernaut of commerce, producing as much harm and doing as little good as that instrument of torture did.

Mr. FISHER.—I think that the merchants will find a way to escape it.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not wish them to avoid compliance with proper provisions, and I shall assist the Minister to make the measure as effective as possible, so far as I think we should go.
This is one way in which its provisions may be readily evaded. Goods will be imported—

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Or manufactured here.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I was going to refer later on to the movement of goods from State to State. It is a ridiculous thing to provide, if goods are manufactured in a State, and allowed to be sold there under a particular trade description, that they shall not be imported under that description, and I have prepared an amendment to alter that provision, which,
as it stands, is a piece of hypocrisy which I venture to think this Parliament is not capable of sanctioning.

Mr. PAGE.—Is not that protection?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member has hit upon what, though not the avowed object of the measure, may be one of its hidden objects. The point to which I was about to refer is that goods may be imported, and then re-described, re-labelled, or re-invoiced. Many goods are sent out in bulk packages, and unless the States laws forbid, may, after importation, be re-marked and re-invoiced.

Mr. FISHER.—That would be a new industry.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not think that the honorable member wishes to see that industry established within our borders. Although some of the advocates of the measure seem to think that it will protect the consumer, it is absolutely careless about him in regard to goods produced in one State and sent to another. I admit that we cannot legislate in respect to goods produced in a State and not exported from it, and, for that reason, the effect of the Bill will be very largely circumscribed.

We can, however, legislate in regard to goods passing from State to State, but the Bill does not apply to such goods.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Would the honorable member support such an extension of its provisions?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Yes, if the Bill is to go through in such a form as I think it should take. Surely it is even more necessary to insist upon honesty on the part of our own people than to try to provide against dishonesty which may be committed by persons outside the Commonwealth?

Mr. FISHER.—Would the honorable member, if we had the power, apply the provisions of the Bill to goods retained within the State in which they were manufactured?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — Certainly; with the limitation I have just made. But I would not support the absurdity of providing that goods branded similarly to goods manufactured within a State, and allowed by the State law to be sold there, shall not be imported into that State. It is the province of the Parliaments of the States to protect their citizens, and they should exercise their powers in that direction. It is almost impossible to believe that any Parliament would pass a measure which, while prohibiting the importation of goods branded in a certain way, would allow the manufacture and sale within its territory of goods so branded. Then there is the matter of grading, which has already been referred to in some of the State Parliaments. It is of the utmost importance to the States that they should know what are our intentions, and what are the powers which will be conferred by the Bill. Clause 13 says—

Any goods intended for export which have been inspected in pursuance of this Act may, in manner prescribed, be marked—with any word, figure, or mark, for the purpose of indicating the quality, class, or grade of the goods.

That is, on behalf of the Commonwealth—

If that does not clearly indicate grading by the Commonwealth, I do not know what does.

Mr. FISHER.—I never believed that it did anything else.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Perhaps the honorable member was present when I tried to get a statement from the Ministers as to the meaning of the clause, and they were at a loss to explain its meaning. All that we can get from the Minister of Trade and Customs is that, if an attempt is made to brand inferior butter as superior, the Government will step in.

Mr. FISHER.—Quite right.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not object to that; but I wish to know if the Government are going to take in hand the work of grading. If they are going to decide what shall be the quality of the butter or other goods which we export, it seems to me that they will have to grade our exports, and if they intend to do that, the States should know it. Otherwise we shall be piling Commonwealth legislation on the top of State legislation, until we bury the commerce and people of Australia beneath it. We do not wish to do that. We should try to delimit the spheres of operation of the States and of the Commonwealth. To give the Minister power to grade every article of export would be to give him an enormous power, and we should know if that is the intention. If such an extension of power is not needed, why is it asked for? If it is needed, the intention must be to use it, and, if that is the intention, the States should know it. Surely, therefore, since the interests of the States are our interests in this matter, they should be permitted the opportunity to send representatives to a Select Committee to express their views as to what is their proper sphere of action, and what is the proper sphere of the Commonwealth. I think that the fullest reasons possible have been shown for referring the Bill to a Select Committee. There is no pressing haste. The measure can accomplish very little good as it is if put into force. It gives the Minister power to exclude any import, not because of a false description, but because of a description which, however much sanctioned by custom, or however true, departs from that laid down by the Minister. It also gives the Government power to grade every article of export. Are we going to place such powers in the hands of the Minister, without limitation, and without knowing whether he intends to use them? If the power to grade is not to be exercised, why has clause 13 been inserted? Surely the States have a right to this knowledge, and to place evidence before a Select Committee as to the desirability or otherwise of these provisions. Whilst I cannot indorse many of the complaints which have been made in the States against this Parliament, if we embarrass the ordinary transaction of business by the duplication of laws, and the enactment of unnecessary and complicating measures, we shall justify some of those complaints. Apparently the only object sought to be attained by this measure is that a true description of goods shall be given. I say that a true description should be insisted upon, but, in endeavouring to attain that object, the measure goes far beyond what is required. In effect, the Government say, "We care not whether your description is true or not; we shall prescribe a description, and unless your goods bear it they shall not enter the Commonwealth." It is apparently assumed that goods are put up all over the world solely for consumption in the Commonwealth. Any one who knows anything about trade will fully appreciate the effect of such a provision. Goods intended for Australia would have to be specially prepared and packed, and bear the description prescribed at the whim of the Minister. That would involve increased expense, because goods cannot be specially packed and labelled without involving considerably increased cost. The effect of such provision would be to hamper Australia in the markets of the world, and to hamper our competition with other countries. We have no right to go beyond the provisions of that clause which provides for a true trade description. I feel that the request of the honorable member for Koo-yong is fully justified. This House, as the special custodian of the large interests of Australia, should exercise its powers with every consideration. Whilst we should do everything we can to prevent fraud and deception, we should not pass a Bill merely because we think it possibly may have such an effect. As a matter of fact, the provisions of this Bill do not make that result at all certain. Adulterated or defective goods will be admitted just as freely as ever. It will merely be necessary to describe adulterated leather as what it is, or to describe an article used as leather by its true name. The articles will then be admitted, and there will be nothing except the operation of the laws of the States to prevent their going into consumption. Under these circumstances, the Commonwealth, which recognises that its powers in connexion with trade and commerce are extensive, should act only after careful consideration. We should not refuse an opportunity, such as a Select Committee would provide, for a careful examination into the possible effects of the proposed measure upon the import and export trade of Australia. So far as I can judge, honorable members have not thoroughly grasped the provisions of the Bill. They seem to think that it will accomplish what it will certainly fail to do. The Bill as it is can have nothing but a disastrous effect, and can benefit neither producer, trader, nor consumer. I hope, therefore, that the Minister will afford an opportunity to those best acquainted with the trade of the Commonwealth, and the probable effects of a measure of this kind, to express their opinions. There is no need for undue haste. The measure is not required to-morrow or the next day. I have no desire to obstruct its progress, but I think that an inquiry such as that proposed by the honorable member for Koo-yong, which can be conducted without much delay, should certainly be entered upon.

Mr. CHANTER (Riverina). — The honorable member for North Sydney has stated that there is no need for haste in passing a measure of this kind; but I would point out that we have badly needed legislation of this kind for many years past. I do not consider that there is any necessity to appoint a Committee to inquire into facts which are already well known. The object of the Bill is to insure that all Australian products exported shall bear an honest description.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—More than that; they have to bear the description prescribed by the Minister.

Mr. CHANTER.—I do not agree with the honorable member. The Minister is not supposed to act as an expert in the matter; but he will undoubtedly rally round him a number of capable officers who will be able to advise him upon practical lines, and in such a manner as to make the operation of the measure effective.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He will require an army of inspectors.

Mr. CHANTER.—I do not think so. It is highly desirable that we should bring about uniformity in connexion with our export trade. Some States authorities have been very careful to insure that their products shall bear proper descriptions, but the good work thus accomplished has been to some extent nullified by other States which have resorted to means that, to say the least, were not honest. The honorable member for Parramatta, in speaking of the prohibitive regulations relating to the importation of fruits into Western Australia, appeared to forget that the importation of certain fruits into New South Wales was also prohibited. For many years—and I believe even to this day—the importation of grapes and vine cuttings into New South Wales has been prohibited. The various States Governments have interfered with importations in the interests of their own producers, and I think that it is our duty to legislate in the interests of the producers of the whole Commonwealth, by insisting that all goods sent out of Australia shall bear a true description.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Does that mean grading?

Mr. CHANTER.—If there is any necessity for grading, I see no reason why it should not be resorted to.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Does the honorable member know whether the Minister intends to insist upon grading?

Mr. CHANTER.—No, I have not consulted the Minister. I do not think the honorable member for Parramatta did himself justice when he was speaking with regard to the Eastern trade, and the usages of traders in regard to tinned goods. He referred to the practice of packing articles in tins containing less than the declared quantity. I asked him whether he approved of that course, and he replied in the negative. The object of the measure is to insure that the tins in which jam or other articles are packed shall contain the declared quantity.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is obvious that unless that practice was also followed in other parts of the world, we should lose our trade.

Mr. CHANTER.—We had better lose our trade than act dishonestly.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am glad to hear that the honorable member is so ready to assist the Chinamen.

Mr. CHANTER.—I have not said anything to indicate that I have any sympathy with Chinamen. The honorable member conveyed the impression that Chinamen did not care what were the contents of the tins, so long as they were of a certain size, but I think that that question may be left to the Chinamen to settle.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am not concerned about the Chinamen, but about our merchants.

Mr. CHANTER.—I am concerned about the whole of the producers of Australia. When Australian produce is exported I desire that it shall bear an intimation as to its origin, and as to its quality. That would prevent inferior goods being placed upon the London market and labelled "Australia." Let me give an instance of the frauds which are perpetrated in this connexion. As honorable members are aware, we have endeavoured for many years past to establish a trade with the old country in frozen meat. In attempting to build up that trade we have had to compete with the Argentine and New Zealand. The New Zealand brands of frozen meat have always been regarded as first class, and the Argentine brands have also been held to be very good. The best lambs produced in the mother country come from Wales, and I have the assurance of a New South Wales pastoralist that he forwarded his lambs to England in a frozen condition, and afterwards saw them hanging in a London butcher's shop, classed as the best Welsh lambs, whilst inferior lambs were classed as Australian.

Mr. LONSDALE.—How will this Bill prevent that practice?

Mr. CHANTER.—It will necessitate the branding of Australian goods which are exported.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Those brands will be taken off Australian goods by the same rascals who indulge in that practice now.

Mr. CHANTER.—Then we may safely leave their punishment to the British Parliament.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We cannot stop men from doing that sort of thing.

Mr. CHANTER.—We cannot prevent burglary, but we can mitigate it. I claim that as good beef, mutton, and lamb can be produced in Australia as can be grown in any part of the world. The same remark is applicable to wheat. As a matter of fact, we know that some of the best brands of wheat exported from the Commonwealth have been sold in England as Manitoba wheat, to the detriment of the Australian farmer.

Mr. LONSDALE.—How does the honorable member suggest that wheat shall be branded?

Mr. CHANTER.—We can brand the bags. In dealing with the article which recently appeared in the Age newspaper, the honorable member for Parramatta was scarcely just to that journal.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—What he said was perfectly true.

Mr. CHANTER.—I challenge the honorable and learned member for Parkes to read that article and to say that it does not exhibit as much consideration for the consumers as it does for the producers of Australia. The Age has consistently exposed everything in the nature of fraud.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why does the honorable member say that I misquoted the article?

Mr. CHANTER.—I did not say that. I said that the honorable member had not properly quoted it. He stated that the article in question exhibited consideration for the producers only — that it did not study the interests of the consumers.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Has the honorable member himself read the article?

Mr. CHANTER.—Yes. I take a pride in reading every article which appears in that newspaper. From a lifelong experience I can say that the Age is the most liberal and democratic newspaper in Australia, and that it has been its constant endeavour to expose the frauds which are perpetrated upon consumers and producers alike. Can the deputy leader of the Opposition deny that, in order to meet the prejudice which exists against local manufactures, labels have been attached to certain articles manufactured in New South Wales, declaring that they were manufactured outside the Commonwealth?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—This Bill will not prevent that.

Mr. CHANTER.—It will, otherwise what is the meaning of the term, "trade description." The Bill provides that no goods shall be imported into Australia unless they are properly described, and the same condition is applicable to goods exported from the Commonwealth.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That does not touch the practice of marking goods dishonestly after they have been imported.

Mr. CHANTER.—If the Bill be properly administered, it will prevent the importation of falsely described goods.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They may be properly described upon their admission to the Commonwealth, and improperly described subsequently.

Mr. CHANTER.—I do not see how that can be so. When they are entered here, they are under the control of the Customs Department. Does the honorable and learned member for Parkes suggest that the merchants of Australia are so dishonest that they will alter the description of those goods in their own warehouses?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The people whom the honorable member alleges commit that sort of fraud now will commit it then.

Mr. CHANTER.—I am glad that that defect in the measure has been pointed out, because we shall now be able to insert an amendment to meet it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We have no power to do that.

Mr. CHANTER.—Does the honorable member wish to stop that fraud?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Let us stop all frauds.

Mr. CHANTER.—Is not the practice to which I refer a gross fraud upon the public?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The honorable member does not understand the Bill.

Mr. CHANTER.—I do not look at its provisions with the legal mind of the honorable and learned member for Parkes. I regard it rather from a practical standpoint. The object of the measure is to guarantee to the consumer that all goods imported shall be properly described. It is also intended to guarantee that Australian produce which is exported shall be similarly described, and, if necessary, graded; in other words, that produce of a certain quality shall not be placed upon the London market as first-class, to the detriment of the local producer. A little while ago, the honorable member for New England interjected, "What about clause 7?" That provision will prohibit the importation of any goods which are not properly described.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Upon a description proclaimed by the Minister.

Mr. CHANTER.—No. I gather from the remarks of some honorable members that an inferior article, in the form of leather, was exhibited in this Chamber to-night. Is it not in the interests of the consumers that such goods should be prevented from entering into competition with the genuine article? The Bill imposes no hardship upon honest traders, and I refuse to regard the merchants of Australia as dishonest.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I am afraid it is the manufacturers who put "manufactured in England" upon Australian hats very frequently.

Mr. CHANTER.—I have worn both imported and Australian hats, and I have no hesitation in saying that a comparison between the two is very greatly to the advantage of the locally-produced article. I hope that in Committee the honorable and learned member for Parkes will assist us to protect the consumer.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—My desire for honesty is so great, that I should like to see the millennium to-morrow.

Mr. CHANTER.—I do not intend to occupy any further time. I hold that this Bill makes for honesty, where, at present, we have dishonesty. It is intended to protect the consumers of Australia, inasmuch as it provides that all goods imported must be properly described. If they are not of good quality, the consumer has only himself to blame, if he purchases them. In the interests of Australia, as a whole, I hope that the measure will speedily become law. There is absolutely no necessity whatever to refer it to a Select Committee.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—During the course of his remarks, the honorable member for Riverina implied that I do not understand clause 7 of the Bill. I think it will be generally admitted that he does not understand it. It was apparent that he had not read it carefully. I would point out to him that the clause does not deal with false trade descriptions. It provides that—

The Governor-General may by proclamation prohibit the importation or introduction into Australia of any goods specified in the proclamation, unless there is applied to them a trade description of such character, relating to such matters, and applied in such manner, as is prescribed by the proclamation or by the regulations.

In other words, the Minister, by proclamation, may prescribe certain descriptions regarding goods of which he really knows nothing. When those goods are imported they may be not only prohibited, but absolutely forfeited, not because they are improperly described, but because they do not bear the trade description which the Minister of his own motion has proclaimed as that which should appear upon them. Will any one say that that is a reasonable power to place in the hands of the Minister? No one would object to a provision requiring that all goods should bear proper trade descriptions, but the clause goes beyond that. The honorable member for Riverina said that Australian lambs were being sold in England as "superior Welsh lambs." I would remind him that this Bill would not in any way abolish that practice. Even assuming that packages containing Australian lambs bore a true description of their contents on being exported, there would be nothing to prevent a man in England taking them out of those packages and selling them as "Welsh lambs."

Mr. CHANTER.—There is a registered ear-mark for Australian lambs exposed for sale.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Quite so; but I am speaking of what can be done under this Bill. Notwithstanding that there is a registered ear-mark in respect of Australian lambs, the fact remains that lambs so marked are being sold in the old country as "superior Welsh lambs." The Bill cannot interfere with that practice, and therefore the statements made by the honorable member were quite beside the mark. Then, again, we cannot prevent traders in other parts of the world from offering Australian wheat for sale as Manitoba wheat if they desire to do so. How could we brand the wheat we export? True, we might brand the bags, but it would be easy for those purchasing them in other countries to shoot the wheat into different bags, and to sell it as having been grown in Manitoba. How could such practices be prevented by any Bill that we might pass? When the honorable member suggests that they could he is talking absolute nonsense. We might impose certain restrictions so far as trade in Australia was concerned, but we could not regulate the actions of traders in other parts of the world. The consumer must protect himself; he must take care to examine the goods he buys, and to determine their quality for himself. I take exception to the powers proposed to be vested by this Bill in officers of the Department. To my mind they have not the requisite knowledge to enable them to judge of the quality of the various classes of goods passing through their hands. They are reared in an atmosphere of suspicion. They suspect every one. They are always after the man seeking to defraud the Customs—in fact, their environment is such as to make them naturally suspicious. They are not the right men to deal with delicate matters of trade and commerce as between Australia and other parts of the world. We have had illustrations of what may be done by these officers. I take it that in regard to a case which was recently discussed at length in the House the Minister was guided by the advice of his officers. If that be so, he must recognise that the advice tendered to him was wrong—that it was tendered in accordance with political opinions, and was not due to any special knowledge the officers possessed.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They have no political opinions.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I have no hesitation in saying that their advice was given really in accordance with their political opinions. The right honorable gentleman perhaps does not know them as well as do other people.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They are not here to defend themselves, and the honorable member is acting meanly in speaking of them in this way.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am simply stating a plain fact.

Mr. STORRER.—They are paid to protect the revenue of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am confident that their advice in the harvester case was the result of their political opinions. The price at which they fixed those goods was altogether too high.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I suppose the honorable member would say the same in regard to the jute wheat-bags?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not know anything about the case to which the honorable member refers.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The inferior bags, at all events, have been prevented from coming in.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The matter has not been discussed in the House, and I am not familiar with the details. I would go so far as to say that an exporter of goods should be required to place upon them a fair description—that he should place his own name and the brand of his factory upon them. If that were done, in a very short time his name would become a guarantee of the quality of the goods which he sent forth to the world, and he would reap the reward of sending out the very best, or the very worst article as the case might be. I would not allow a man to export goods under the name of any other person, or under the name of a factory with which he was not connected. If, however, any one wished to export goods of second grade, I fail to see why he should not be permitted to do so, as long as he did not attempt to deceive the public.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Bill will allow that to be done.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I object to the vision that grading shall be carried by officers of the Commonwealth. Government cannot successfully carry the work. It would be utterly impossible for the Government, for instance, to grade the butter that we export. I take, for example, the position of the Byron Bay factory, which is thoroughly representative of the butter factories of New South Wales. That factory carries on its own business, and employs no Government officers. We have a State Board of Health to see that the dairies are properly constructed so that due attention is given to cleanliness. Every care is taken to insure the purity of the butter, and the factory-owners do not require any further Government interference.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is done in Victoria.

Mr. LONSDALE.—That is where this comes from. There is absolutely no self-reliance shown by the people of this State. They are crying out for a time for Government interference. The Minister says, "We have this system in Victoria," and I reply at once that the defects brought to light by the Butter Commission were the outcome of Government interference.

Mr. FRAZER.—They were nearly as bad as the practices revealed by the New Wales Land Commission.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The latter was the result of Government interference, which was admitted by witnesses examined by the Butter Commission that the Government stamp was often missing from its place, and that the officers were unable to say where it was to be found. I point out that it was being used by persons who were sending out inferior butter, and placing upon it the Government brand of quality. A concrete illustration of the ineffectiveness of Government grading was given the other day by the honorable member for Warrumbungle. He explained that he and a neighbour sent some lambs to the Victoria Government export stores, and that they declined to brand those forwarded to them as being fit for export. His neighbour's lambs, however, were branded in the same way, and both consignments went home on the same ship. They were consigned to the same salesman, and were sold on the same day, in the same market, with the result that those which the Government officers had refused to brand as being fit for export brought the highest prices. I was referred to the position of the Byron Bay factory.

when I was interrupted by the interjection of the Minister that the Victorian Government adopted this system. All that I have to say in that regard is that the sooner the people of Victoria refrain from seeking Government aid on every possible occasion the better. The Byron Bay factory, which, as I have said, is representative of the butter factories of New South Wales, asks for no Government interference. Seventy-five per cent. of the butter which it makes is sent into the markets of the world, and secures prices quite equal to those realized by butter manufactured elsewhere. The factory pays its suppliers of milk no less than £1,000 per day, and is in short the largest in the Commonwealth. The company are doing their own work, and simply ask the Government to leave them alone. They have made a name for themselves without any law such as that which we are now asked to pass. I was speaking the other day to one of the directors, who had just returned from a trip to England on the business of the company. They have no commercial agents, and he assured me that he had secured a reduction in respect of the insurance on the butter from the factory to the market, which in one year would more than cover the whole expenses of his trip. When men are able to conduct their business so satisfactorily, I fail to see why we should interfere with them as proposed by this Bill. The Minister of Trade and Customs referred to butter as one of the articles that would probably be graded. Imagine the Government grading the butter of a factory like that of Byron Bay, which is already securing top prices. Mr. Davidson, a large English buyer, was in Australia a little while ago, and was examined by the Select Committee on dairying which sat in Sydney. He distinctly stated that they did not buy the butter on the Government brand, but on its quality. He further said that the New South Wales butter, which is not branded with the Government stamp, obtains in the market a price equal to that given for the New Zealand butter, which bears the Government brand. When factories get a name for the quality of their butter, that butter obtains a good price wherever it is known, whether it bears a Government brand or not. The less the Government interferes the better. When a substance is injurious to health, or does not answer the purposes for which it is sold, its importation should be prohibited; but, under the Bill, although the importation of goods under a false description is prohibited, there is nothing to prevent the alteration of the description and subsequent sale of the goods after they have passed through the Customs barrier. For instance, there is nothing to prevent the importation of adulterated manures, if their contents are properly described, and their subsequent sale under a different designation.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member's opinion of the honesty of the middleman is not very high.

Mr. LONSDALE.—If persons will import goods of poor quality—and the Bill is an admission of the belief of the Ministry that they do so—they will sell such goods after importation. I think that all that is required is the prohibition of the importation of goods which are harmful. The Bill will not prevent manufacturers within the Commonwealth from turning out such inferior goods as have been shown here this evening. It may be that these goods were manufactured within the Commonwealth. Some years ago I visited Victoria to see what was being done here in the manufacturing line, and was told by one of the partners of a large boot-manufacturing establishment that some manufacturers were taking a side of leather, splitting it into three, and using these split pieces to make uppers, the soles of the boots being made out of belly pieces and other inferior parts. Boots made in this way were being sold in Victoria, notwithstanding all the Government interference here, and the outcry against the importation of shoddy. I bought a pair of these boots, and took them back to New South Wales, as an example of what was being done here.

Mr. CROUCH.—What did the honorable member pay for them?

Mr. LONSDALE.—Something like 3s. a pair. I do not say that they were highly-priced boots. All that I say is that they were shoddy. The Bill does not prevent the wearers of boots and shoes from being victimized by local manufacturers of such shoddy. Its real object is not to protect the consumers, but to protect the local manufacturers. Even the honorable member for Riverina spoke of the need for protecting the consumer from being victimized by manufacturers here, although that is something which this Parliament cannot do; but the fact that such different opinions are held with regard to the measure shows the need for sending it to a Select Committee, so that those who have a knowledge of its probable effects may give evidence upon it, and it may be understood, and made as perfect as possible. I shall support the motion, and I hope that the Minister will agree to it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH (Parkes).—As I have had the advantage of speaking on the second reading of the Bill, I do not propose, if I can help it, to repeat anything which I said on that occasion, although the whole field is open to me under this motion. During the discussion a number of interjections have been made by honorable members of the Labour Party and others, which convince me that the measure is a very difficult one to oppose, not because of its nature, but because its supporters are evidently influenced by sentiment, and a very strong bias of a class character. I justify my statement in this way. The honorable member for Darling has brought into the Chamber two or three samples of articles in daily use, as instances of the fraud of some manufacturers. I admit his right to show these articles to honorable members, but his action proves the existence of sentiment behind the support which is being given to the Bill, and all experienced advocates know well that when you have sentiment and prejudice to deal with, all the logic in the world is of very little avail. I, therefore, feel that this is a very difficult Bill to oppose, or even to get referred to a Select Committee; but I shall address myself not to the bias or prejudice to which I have alluded, but to the reasons which it seems to me ought to actuate every level-headed man in this Chamber in dealing with it. In the first place, the honorable member for Kooyong is not endeavouring to kill the Bill, or even to injure, or belittle it. He has pointed out what I think he is not only entitled, but bound to point out, having regard to the position he occupies in the community as the head of the mercantile classes, that almost all the Chambers of Commerce in Australia have seen reason to direct their attention to the character of the measure, and to ask, not for its rejection, but for an investigation into its probable effects. I do not think it possible for an intelligent community to make a more rational request than that; and it was very well said by the honorable member for North Sydney that, if the Minister is not prepared to allow the measure to be investigated by competent men, he has very little confidence in it. I know that there is a very strong prejudice nowadays against the appointment of Select Committees and Royal Commissions, though I do not think that justified. If the Select Committee is constituted of competent men, whose views are open, and the evidence of merchants and consumers—because I am a great advocate for the consumers—is put before them, no harm can be done; but the House afterwards be given an opportunity to judge as to the wisdom of passing this sort of legislation. The Minister has not before us any extraordinary circumstances necessitating haste in connexion with the measure. It is really not a measure introduced by him, but an heirloom from the Reid-McLean Administration; though an extraordinary thing is that the purpose intended by them has been frustrated. There is an old gibe about the difficulty of getting a joke into a Solomon's head, except by surgical operation, and the speech of the honorable member for Riverina, following that of the honorable member for North Sydney, said to me that it is equally difficult to get reasoning into the heads of some men. The honorable member for Riverina seems to have completely lost sight of the main fact before the House by the honorable member for North Sydney, who showed that if the Bill fails, not partially, but utterly, it will effect the purpose of the Ministry in framing it, namely, the protection of the purchasers and consumers of Australia. The Bill deals solely with importation and exportation. It requires every importer to give a specific description of every article that he brings into the country before it can pass the barrier of Customs-house officers; and it requires the exporters to describe accurately and truthfully every article which he wishes to export before it will be allowed to pass that barrier. If there is nothing in the Bill to provide for the following of our exports after they leave our shores, or to provide for the following of imports after they have passed the barrier of the Customs-house officers, it requires very little thought, after the speech of the honorable member for North Sydney, to see how the Government has lost sight of the original intention of the Bill to protect the consumers. A description is defined in the measure to mean a description which is likely to lead. It is not provided that a description shall not be false, "and" likely to mislead, but it must not be false, "or" likely mislead. Nothing must come into this country under a description "likely to mislead," because such a description is defined in the Bill as a false one. We have been shown material which is said to be passed off as leather, though it is nothing but brown paper. I will take that as a typical case. There is not in this Bill any clause which will prevent the country being flooded with that commodity. It may be correctly described when it is imported. There is nothing easier than for an importer to describe that material as "imitation leather made of paper." He may bring in tons of it. It first pays duty—a lower duty than it would pay as leather. Then it can be sold to the manufacturers, and the manufacturers of Victoria can, without let or hindrance of any kind, make up hundreds of pairs of boots for use by the people of Australia. We are told that under this Bill it is possible to stop deleterious liquids which are sold as patent medicines. We know very well that a lot of very unwholesome stuff comes into this country bottled and labelled with all sorts of pretentious statements. But there is nothing to prevent an American or an European, or, if we like, a British firm, from sending the most injurious liquids in barrels into this country. The importer may give a truthful description of it. He may even, if honorable members like, call it by an injurious name—by a name that will discount its value. But the moment it passes the Customs House, it may go into a store, where it can be labelled and bottled, and it may afterwards be distributed all over Australia and consumed by the Australian people. There is not a word in this Bill to protect the public in such a case. Whether it is a question of importation or of exportation, there is not a clause in this Bill that protects either the public of the country to which our goods go, or the public of Australia to whom importations come. Surely the public for whom we have most concern, and regarding whom our highest duty exists, is the public of Australia. Yet there is not a word in this Bill that prevents a manufacturer of Victoria from sending goods which are falsely described into all the other States. There is not a word in this Bill that prevents a manufacturer in New South Wales from sending goods under a false description into other States. The whole purpose of this Bill has been lost. The consumer is neglected and disregarded in every clause. Still, that cannot be a fault in the eyes of some people, because, although I do not quote this passage with any evil intention, it is a fact that it appeared in an article in the Age only three days ago. I should like the honorable member for Riverina to listen to it, because, without, I think, taking the trouble to look at the article, he had the courage practically to accuse the honorable member for Parramatta of misquoting the journal.

Mr. CHANTER. — I beg the honorable member's pardon. I did not say he misquoted it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The honorable member practically charged the honorable member for Parramatta with unfairly criticising the article. I shall read what the newspaper said—

That is protection in its essence. It proclaims aloud as its cardinal principle, "Take care of the producer and the consumer will take care of himself." It is the very antithesis of the free-trader, who says, "Take care of the consumer and the producer will take care of himself." In these two phrases lies the essential antagonism of the two schools.

The honorable member for Parramatta said the Age laid this down as a fundamental principle—"Look after the producer and the consumer will look after himself," and that it had said of free-trade and free-traders that their principle was that if the State looked after the consumer the producer would look after himself. I say that that was practically a verbatim statement of what is contained in this article. I do not quote that for the purpose of attaching this Bill to either party in this House. But I do say that it is very gratifying to feel that that principle is not being espoused by the Minister in charge of the Bill. Because he has claimed it as a merit of this measure, that it does look after the interests of the consumer. If it did conserve the interests of the consumer without being calculated, in my opinion, to paralyze commerce, by reason of its attempt to moralize the whole commercial ramifications of Australian and foreign trade, I should be very glad to assist the Government in doing anything which would establish a higher standard of morals in trade. As I have stated in answer to an interjection, we all desire to make commerce and industry as honest as possible, but every practical man with a knowledge of the world recognises that there is a limit to one's ability—not to one's desire, but to one's practical ability—to introduce a higher system of morals in either trade or commerce. I suppose that the common law of England is about as old an institution as we have, and, as I said once before, the common law of England recognises the impossibility of these higher standards of morals. I do not wish to be misunderstood as advocating a low standard of commercial morality in industry or commerce; but I am talking of our practical ability to deal with the subject. We often say of young people that they are impracticable because they do not know the world. As men get up in years, and acquire experience, they recognise, not that higher morals and ethics are less desirable, but that they are less attainable than young people are apt to imagine. I say that we should endeavour to check attempts to pass what I might call millennial measures—measures that are futile and impossible in their aspirations. The common law has long since recognised that it cannot insist in every case on the most absolute honesty on the part of parties who are concerned in commercial transactions.

Mr. WEBSTER.—It succeeds to a degree.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Will the honorable member allow me, as one who has given some attention to the subject, to state the conclusion at which I have arrived? The common law lays this down as a rule—that if a man enters into a contract, and then finds he has been deceived, if he can show that the deception has been in regard to a latent defect, he has a remedy. But if it is a defect that he could have seen, the law says: “You may have been deceived, but we cannot protect you; Caveat emptor—let the buyer beware.” There is another principle of law which throws a very interesting light upon the fact that the Law Courts have seen the impossibility of going to extremes in these matters. We know very well that there is in law an offence which is called slander of goods; that is to say that one tradesman is not allowed to depreciate the goods of another tradesman beyond a certain point. But the Courts have recognised that what is called legitimate puffing in trade cannot be stopped by law. Therefore, when actions occur for what is called slander of goods the Judges constantly say, “Certainly, this is not true; but it is a mere puffing of the business which the law will regard as a legal wrong.”

Mr. CROUCH.—An auctioneer’s advertisement, for instance.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—If we are going to carry what I call the Truthful James standard—that is the name of a very moral book which all boys and girls used to be asked to read—into all aspects of trade, and to say that there shall be no advertisements on the part of auctioneers, and no description in a shop window such as “this is choice,” or “this is select,” or “this is the best quality,” unless the thing is so, we should have to extend our operations into every ramification of public and private life, and there would be no end to our efforts.

Mr. KNOX.—The Bill will be unfair unless it goes that far.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The Bill will be unfair unless it provides for the protection of the Australian consumer. If the House is convinced that while the Bill provides that whatever comes into Australia shall be properly described for the few minutes or hours during which it is passing the Customs barrier, it can be used for all sorts of fraudulent purposes after it has come into the territory, and it is of opinion that although goods are required to be truthfully described and defined whilst they are passing the Customs barrier for the purpose of exportation to the British and European public, the marks can afterwards be altered to any extent, then we are not succeeding in our purpose. The Bill is not trying to succeed in its purpose, because the Minister in whose charge it is has evidently cut out the very clauses which formed the backbone and purpose of the measure in its original form. I have not, I hope, introduced any warmth into this debate; for, although I may speak vehemently, still I can assure honorable members that I have no feeling in the matter. There is no party feeling in this connexion. This is not a question that touches the issue of free-trade or protection. It is not a question of the strength of the Government or of whether they shall be defeated or not. We are a deliberative body, and are expected by the public to be practical business men. Although we may not be engaged in commerce, still we are expected to have some knowledge of the complexities and difficulties of the great trade which goes on between this country and the outside world. The Treasurer told us, in his Budget, the other night, that, annually, Australia exports goods to the value of £57,000,000, and imports goods to the value of £37,000,000. There is a trade to the amount of almost £95,000,000 a year which is passing into and out of the Commonwealth. This Bill touches every commodity included in that sum, and the House, as a practical Chamber, with self-respect, with a desire not to pass a measure which may develop into a laughing stock, would do well to pause and consider whether it would not be better to have the Bill considered by a Committee of men specially chosen, who have its confidence, and are believed to be honestly and honorably actuated in any inquiry they may make.

Mr. WILKS.—Would not the term “honestly actuated” apply to every member of the House?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH. — I know very well that there is a class feeling existing in the House, because I hear merchants spoken of as if they were a class who were afflicted with a sort of dishonest tendency, just as I hear manufacturers spoken of as if they were an injured class. These are all class biases, which every man who desires to take a level-headed course throws off. He knows very well that in every class, whether it be the importers or the manufacturers or the consumers, there are honest and dishonest persons. Assuming that these prejudices exist in the minds of some honorable members, let us have a Committee whom the whole House approves to examine the manufacturers and the importers. Let the importers be heard at least, because sometimes I hear protectionists talk of importers as if they were a special breed from whom nothing that was honest could be expected. Let the importers be examined on oath, if honorable members like. We know very well that when the Tariff Commission came, the other day, to examine the manufacturers even of Victoria, it was found that they were selling flannel which was supposed to be made of wool with 45 per cent. of cotton in it. That did not startle me, nor did it startle a great many persons.

Mr. CROUCH.—That statement was not proved, and it came from an enemy, who is unreliable.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It was alleged, in the first place, that the flannel contained 70 per cent., but that was shown to be untrue, although it was admitted afterwards by a manufacturer that it contained 45 per cent. I mention that fact, not as against the manufacturer, but to show very well the sort of thing is going on, not among the importers only, but among the manufacturers too. Have we not had instances mentioned here in which hats are being made in these States—it is done in Victoria, and I believe in New South Wales too—and specially marked inside “Made in England.” Why? Because the shopkeeper considers that the consumer, for whom there is so much concern, prefers a hat bearing that mark. Honorable members know very well that all over the world the manufacturer studies the whims and fancies of the public just as carefully in food as in dress. He watches for the tendency of the public in a certain direction. Immediately the American manufacturer detects a tendency towards vegetarianism, he begins to make up all sorts of cereals, in forms which he calls “grape nuts.” We find a variety of goods intended for food which are manufactured in order to appeal to the moving taste of the public in food. Are we going to attempt to cure that, to eradicate it, in order to induce a high standard which, however desirable, all experience has shown to be impracticable? The honorable member for Kooyong, as the president of the combined Chambers of Commerce of Australia, represents a position which we ought to respect here. When I use the term “respect,” I do not wish to be understood as saying that he should receive more attention than does any man who is not connected with those institutions. But he moves this motion for a Select Committee as the representative of a large body of mercantile men who know the difficulties and complexities of commerce. The House would do well not to stop the Bill, but to pause. Under all the circumstances, seeing the extraordinary shortcomings which have been pointed out in the Bill, from the fact that it does not protect the consumer either abroad or here, it behoves the Government and every member of the House to pause with regard to its passage, and merely to say, “We do not express any opinion on the Bill at the present time. We should like some special evidence on its subject-matter from all classes affected, and when we have that evidence, with a short report, the value of which we can judge for ourselves, we can then determine whether the Bill is one which would do credit to the Parliament, and effect the purpose which we have in hand.”

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—We have listened to an admirable speech, which should convince honorable members of the absolute necessity of voting against this measure.

I agree with the honorable and learned member for Parkes that it will not carry out the intention for which it was introduced. It is possible that the commercial immorality of the importer is only equalled by the commercial immorality of the local manufacturer. I know of a manufacturer in New South Wales who has placed locally-made boots on the Sydney market with the brand, "Made in America." This gentleman is a good protectionist, and is well known to some members of the Ministry, and he has availed himself of the subterfuge to which I have referred to sell the goods he manufactures. We are aware that the principal intention of such a measure as this should be to secure to the consumer a healthy food supply. We are not so much concerned with inferior wearing apparel, as with the injury done to the health of the community by the consumption of foods and medicines of a deleterious character. This is a matter which can best be dealt with by a Foods Adulteration Bill. I have already spoken on the second reading of this measure, and I now rise merely to protest against it being referred to a Select Committee. In almost every speech I have recently made, I have had to direct attention to the tendency on the part of members of this House to grant applications made for the appointment of Royal Commissions and Select Committees. I do not wish to pose as an Ishmaelite in my opposition to this tendency. The honorable and learned member for Parkes has just inferred that this House seems indisposed to grant a Select Committee for the consideration of measures of this kind. The position is absolutely the reverse, and there is now hardly a member of the House who is not a member of one or more Select Committees, or of a Royal Commission. The honorable and learned member for Parkes has said that this measure will not carry out the intention with which it has been introduced, and should consequently be referred to a Select Committee. In proposing that this measure should be so referred, the intention of honorable members may be to destroy it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—There is some merit in the Bill, and we do not wish to destroy it.

Mr. WILKS.—If some honorable members desire that it should be referred to a Select Committee, in order that it might be destroyed, that should be stated openly.

Mr. KNOX.—That is not my intention.

Mr. WILKS.—I am aware that it is not the intention of the honorable member for Kooyong. I desire, as strongly as does any member of the House, to protect the interests of the consumers of Australia. In their own interests the Government should resist the attempt to refer this measure to a Select Committee. If they believe in it they should fight to the last ditch to carry it, and if they do not believe in it they should withdraw it. Are we to understand that in the Commonwealth Parliament, which should be the exemplar for all the Parliaments of Australia, there has been introduced a system of Government by Select Committees? Why should this measure be sent to a Select Committee? Is it desired to obtain information which the departmental officers should have obtained for the Minister? I am tired of the practice of sheltering civil servants. The Minister of Trade and Customs is supposed to have at his command the advice of expert officials, and if they have failed to arm him with information to meet the objections urged against this Bill they have neglected their duty, and should be dismissed. Instead of this action being taken it is proposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee; that will involve expense and further delay.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Bill will not go to a Select Committee if I can help it, and that is also the view of the Prime Minister.

Mr. WILKS. — Will the Minister of Trade and Customs resist the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Certainly.

Mr. WILKS. — The Prime Minister must know that the tendency to refer measures to Select Committees and Royal Commissions is positively becoming a disease in this House. The honorable and learned gentleman knows that there is such a thing as Ministerial responsibility, and I ask whether he and the members of his Government are prepared to continue in office under a system of Government by Select Committees?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think honorable members will hear any more of the Bill if it is referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. WILKS.—Is that an admission that the Minister fears that the Select Committee would emasculate the Bill?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Certainly not; but I will not have the measure taken out of my hands.

Mr. WILKS.—I can applaud the Minister for that. I believe the honorable gentleman takes a proper stand when he says that, having introduced the Bill, he will not allow the measure to be taken out of his hands. That is in accord with our system of responsible government. I trust that the press will take notice of the great expense to which the Commonwealth is put by the frequent appointment of Select Committees and Royal Commissions.

Debate (on motion by Mr. SPENCE) adjourned.

HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Mr. SPEAKER reported the receipt of a message from the Senate forwarding the following resolution, and requesting the concurrence of the House of Representatives—

That, in the opinion of the Senate, the High Commissioner for the Commonwealth of Australia should, when selected, be selected by exhaustive ballot at a joint meeting of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. FRAZER (Kalgoorlie).—I have been asked by the honorable senator who moved the resolution in another place to take charge of it in this House, and I move—

That the consideration of the message in Committee be made an order of the day for Thursday, 12th October.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—ORIENT MAIL CONTRACT FOR BRISBANE SERVICE.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

To-morrow we propose to continue the debate on the Commerce Bill.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I desire to know whether the Prime Minister is in a position to afford us any further information with regard to the arrangements for the extension of the Orient mail service to Brisbane?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The despatch received from the Premier of Queensland, covering the new contract made between that State and the Orient Company, has only just come to hand, and some time will be required for its consideration. I do not hope to be able to deal with the matter before the end of next week, if then.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 11.2 p.m.

Senate.

Friday, 15 September, 1905.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

MILITARY SYSTEM.

Senator HIGGS.—I wish to ask the Minister of Defence, without notice, whether he has read the report of the proceedings in another place, in which the administration of the Military Forces has been questioned, and if so, whether he proposes to have a general inquiry made as to our military system as a whole, and not merely as to the regulations?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I have only glanced through the Age report of the proceedings in another place. Not one of the cases therein mentioned was known to me except that of the man called Watts, who had applied to be examined, so that he might qualify himself for promotion from the ranks to the position of an officer, but whose application the late Minister of Defence, Mr. McCay, acting upon the advice of his officers, had refused. When I looked through the papers, I came to the conclusion that the application should be granted, and I gave orders at once accordingly, but it so happened that the examination had taken place. However, he is to go up at the next examination. That is the only case mentioned by Mr. Crouch of which I have any knowledge. I cannot give a definite answer to the question as to whether I shall have a full inquiry held into matters outside the complaints which have been made. But I promise that all the complaints which have been made shall be thoroughly investigated, and that justice shall be done so far as lies in my power. With regard to the broader question of administration. I shall have to consult my honorable colleagues as to what course I should adopt. But, individually, I shall take care that, as regards officers and men, no injustice or unfair treatment shall be permitted; that the officers shall deal impartially and considerately with their men, and that if there is any unjust or unfair treatment of them, punishment shall be meted out to those who are responsible for it.

SUGAR INDUSTRY: ABORIGINES.

Senator WALKER.—Preliminary to asking a question, I desire to draw the attention of the leader of the Senate to the fact that he did not give an answer yesterday to my question concerning the exclusion of aboriginal quadroons and octoroons from the sugar industry. At Bundaberg I have seen quadroons as light in colour as many an honorable senator, and I desire to know whether my honorable friend's answer is intended to apply to quadroons and octoroons, as well as to half-castes?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I think that the Act refers to only half-castes. I do not know in what category quarter-castes or eighth-castes would come, and therefore I cannot answer the question. It is a matter for lawyers to determine. I believe that the Act alludes to only coloured people and half-castes. Whether quadroons and octoroons would be treated as white people I cannot say. At all events, they would have more white than black blood in their veins, and perhaps they might be given the benefit of the doubt.

APPROPRIATION (WORKS AND BUILDINGS) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Debate resumed from 14th September (vide page 2289), on motion by Senator PLAYFORD—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—The Bill asks for a grant of £418,000, but I observe that if it be passed we shall really commit ourselves to an expenditure of about £575,000—in fact, to more than that sum, because the amounts which are to be appropriated total nearly £500,000, and £81,000 is deducted on the ground that it may not be spent during the financial year. It should be remembered that the Treasurer definitely said that he desired to spend during the financial year the full amount of the votes, and we ought to be told whether any special effort is to be made to carry out that desire, because in that case the States might have to provide during the current year for rather more than is asked for.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Treasurer only meant the amount which is set down here.

Senator PULSFORD.—If the works individually are carried out, then the aggregate must be greater than the total sum asked for here, because the Treasurer deducts £81,000.

Senator MATHESON.—He cannot do it.

Senator PULSFORD.—If the Treasurer gets power to do the individual pieces of work mentioned here, and they aggregate £500,000, then that amount will be spent quite apart from the fact that he deducts £81,000. That is a peculiarity of the statement which I think wants a little attention. In passing this Bill, we are not only granting the amount of £418,000 which is asked for, and the £81,000 which is to be carried on, but there is a total of about £75,000 more which appears item by item in footnotes. That is a system which is open, I think, to some abuse. For instance, we are committed here to an expenditure of £30,000 in connexion with the General Post Office at Melbourne, the vote for this year being £10,000. I presume that if the work is once commenced it must be completed.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We do not want the Parliament to vote the money if we cannot spend it.

Senator PULSFORD.—I am not discussing that point now. I am pointing out that by passing this vote to begin the work we commit ourselves practically to its completion, and that therefore the request for a vote of £10,000 practically means committing the Commonwealth to an expenditure of £30,000.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Undoubtedly; that is fully shown here.

Senator PULSFORD.—I do not instance the case of the Melbourne General Post Office for the sake of drawing an invidious comparison, because every New South Welshman admits that in point of accommodation it is far behind the Sydney General Post Office, and that the people of the former city are quite entitled to look for increased accommodation. I am not complaining about the amount now asked for. What I wish to draw attention to is the policy, and I think the Senate ought to look at the amount as £30,000, not as £10,000. If a sum of £30,000 is to be spent in this way, ought not the Senate to have some information on the point? I think so, because as the Commonwealth grows the expenditure will become very large indeed, and by voting a small amount to begin a work it may at times be committed to an expenditure which, if seriously considered, would have been objected to. The amount asked for really aggregates, not £418,000, but £575,000. But it does not quite stop there. There is a footnote on page 7, which says, in regard to the item of £1,000 for a rifle range at Brisbane, "Total estimated cost, exclusive of land, £5,000." I do not know whether the land will cost a small or a large sum, but it is desirable that the Senate should know the estimated purchase price. Another point which must strike us all is the very large sum which is required for Western Australia. Taking the amounts which it is proposed to spend this year and the amounts to which the Commonwealth will be committed, I find a total of £122,000, plus that proportion which goes to Western Australia under the grant for special defence material, so that that State is doing very well out of the Federation. By a contribution of between 6 and 7 per cent. it is obtaining this large expenditure. Of course, as a matter of defence, I recognise that an expenditure in the West is practically an expenditure in the East. Any expenditure for the defence of a vulnerable part of Australia is a payment for the defence of the whole, and therefore I shall always take a broad view of any such proposal. As Western Australia is growing more rapidly than any other State, it is natural that the expenditure for new buildings must be on a large scale. I remark this because I am willing at all times to view such matters as they should be viewed, in a truly Federal spirit, and from the broad stand-point of the welfare of the Commonwealth. There is one question on which I wish to dwell, and that has to do with the distribution of what is known as "other" expenditure. In the papers distributed in connexion with the Budget, are included, on page 14, figures showing the population of the States year by year since Federation and the percentage of each State in the total population of the Commonwealth. I find on the basis of these figures that four of the six States are paying towards expenditure a smaller percentage than their share. They are all paying a larger amount in the aggregate, but four are paying a smaller percentage this year than they did in the census year of 1901. Tasmania, according to this statement, will pay a somewhat smaller proportion; South Australia's contribution will be slightly smaller; and Western Australia's contribution will also be slightly smaller. In the case of those three States the fall in the percentage is so small that we may say that it is practically stationary. However, to make the point clear I will give the difference. The Tasmanian contribution falls off by 0·10; that of South Australia by 0·32; that of Queensland by 0·15. Victoria's proportion, however, falls off by the substantial amount of 1·79. Two States are paying a heavier proportion. Western Australia is one. She is estimated to pay this year 6·35—her total having risen from the census year by 1·50. I may say, in passing, that under the Constitution Western Australia, by virtue of her increase of population, is actually entitled now to five members in the House of Representatives. New South Wales is the other State that is showing an increase of population, and a consequent increase of payment. This brings me to what I consider to be a very important and serious matter. The Government has deliberately refused to recognise the crying need for the redistribution of representation on the ground that the population figures of the Statists cannot be relied upon. But they proceed to distribute the expenditure on the basis of figures which they decline to acknowledge in regard to representation, and which they and their friends for a considerable time past have done their best to prejudice and to discredit. To come to the exact result, I find that if what is known as the "other" expenditure for this current year were distributed on the basis of the population of the census year—that is, the basis on which the representation is fixed—the State of Victoria would have to pay £16,000 more than she is debited with in these accounts. On the other hand, if New South Wales were debited on the figures on which her representation is fixed she would save £7,000. I say that that is a very serious matter. The Government has deliberately done its utmost to put back the re-arrangement of representation. Not only since Ministers have been in office have certain gentlemen done this, but before they reached office they did their best to block the reform. I desire especially that the Senate should notice the fact that New South Wales is called upon to pay—and rightly called upon to pay; I am not objecting to the fact—according to her population. What I object to is that as her population is growing she has been refused that increase of representation which is shown to be her right.

Senator MILLEN.—That is, the expenditure is distributed on figures which the Government refuse to accept for representation purposes?

Senator PULSFORD.—That is it. In the case of Victoria there is a very material reduction in the debit.

Senator PLAYFORD.—These are the Estimates of the previous Government.

Senator MILLEN.—But the Government dispute the estimates of population, except when they want to distribute expenditure.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Evidently that is what the previous Government did.

Senator PULSFORD.—Just so; the previous Government accepted these figures.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that that is relevant to the subject-matter of this Bill?

Senator PULSFORD.—I do. I do not think that anything can be more important than the distribution of expenditure. That is the point I am raising. Yesterday, I had intended to move the following words, as an amendment to the motion, "That the Bill be now read a second time"—

But, in view of the fact that the division amongst the States of the proposed expenditure is to be made on the basis of the estimates of population made by the Statists, this Senate expresses its regret at the delay that has taken place in re-arranging the distribution of seats in the House of Representatives on the same basis, as representation and taxation ought to go together.

The PRESIDENT.—That amendment could not be moved.

Senator PULSFORD.—Since drafting that suggested amendment, I find that the Standing Orders stand in the way. My ammunition and my weapon do not fit. But though I am precluded from moving such an amendment, I am not precluded from drawing the attention of the Senate to the fact that New South Wales is charged a great deal more, and Victoria a great deal less, on the basis of population figures which the present Government say are not to be trusted for the purpose of re-adjusting the representation. This, therefore, is a matter which calls for the attention of the Government. If they discredit the figures, they ought to re-adjust the distribution of the expenditure, but if they admit that the figures are right, they should proceed to deal with the matter of the representation.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I have a few words to say on this Bill. In the first place, I should like to allude to Senator Pulsford's statement that Western Australia is doing very well out of the expenditure on public works.

Senator MILLEN.—It is obvious.

Senator MATHESON.—I have heard other honorable senators make exactly the same remark. But they seem to overlook something which is very important. It is this: That, supposing these public works had been treated as a continuation of old services, and these amounts had been debited to the States instead of to new services, the Commonwealth at an early date would have had to pay the States for the properties transferred in exactly the same way as the Commonwealth is now being debited with the cost of their construction.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—That was, no doubt, Sir George Turner's reason for altering the arrangement.

Senator MATHESON.—I will come to the reason directly. The rate of distribution would have been exactly the same; and when once it is admitted that Western Australia requires to have these works executed, the question of proportion between the States is quite immaterial.

Senator PULSFORD.—I admit that.

Senator MATHESON.—The money has to be spent in the West, and, for all practical purposes, it is immaterial whether the whole of the States are debited per capita to-day or to-morrow.

Senator MILLEN.—That argument is affected by any ultimate scheme which we may adopt for the distribution of surplus revenue after the expiration of the book-keeping period.

Senator MATHESON.—I think the honorable senator is wrong there, because until the transferred properties are paid for, his contention would not affect the case. At the present time, they have not been paid for. However, the position is this: In my opinion, the reason which influenced Sir George Turner in making this arrangement had nothing to do with Western Australia, but arose from the desire to placate the Treasurers and Premiers of the Eastern States. Suppose the States were debited, as they were in the first two or three years, with the expenditure on these works, then the expenditure of the Commonwealth would be largely reduced. The Treasurers of the Eastern States were with one accord anxious to make it appear that the expenditure of the Commonwealth was very much larger than was actually the case. Therefore, they took exception to the method adopted by Sir George Turner in the first two years of the Commonwealth, which was to debit the States directly with additions to old services. The Premiers and Treasurers insisted that these amounts should be debited to the Commonwealth as new services, and the expenditure of the Commonwealth was therefore considerably increased. As honorable senators can see on reference to the Bill, this year it amounts to a total of £418,911. The greater portion of that sum would under the old system have been debited to the States as a continuation of the transferred services, and would not have appeared as Commonwealth expenditure at all. Therefore, the States Treasurers, who have talked so much about the extravagance of the Commonwealth, would have been deprived of the pleasure which that action apparently affords them. That is the reason, as I understand, why the method was adopted, and it is just as well that the reason should be clearly understood, and that the effect of the present procedure should be appreciated by honorable senators when considering these Estimates. To come to the Bill itself, I want, first of all, to deal with the votes on page 17. I think that Senator Playford, with the best intentions in the world, is adopting an extremely unwise policy, which I deprecate very strongly indeed. The Minister of Defence proposes, in dealing with the special defence material items, to omit a large portion of the expenditure which we are asked to authorize, in order that he may apply the funds so saved to the purchase of rifles and cordite, a purchase upon which we shall have no opportunity to express an opinion. The Minister explained perfectly candidly that he proposes to lay a statement before the Senate at a later date.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Senate will then have an opportunity to criticise the expenditure.

Senator MILLEN.—Yes; after the cordite has been purchased and shot away.

Senator MATHESON.—I quite grant that the Senate will have an opportunity to criticise, but we shall have no opportunity to refuse the vote. This, I consider, one of the most important rights of the Senate, and one which ought to be very carefully safeguarded. I do not in the least wish to impute any want of good faith to the Minister of Defence. I know that the honorable senator is approaching the matter with the best intentions in the world, but the procedure which he proposes to adopt seems open to very grave criticism. I shall now proceed to explain why I think, on the figures before us, that the proposed action is unwise. I cannot think that Senator Playford has cast up the sum total of the figures, or he would see that what he proposes is hardly feasible, so long as he retains a certain portion of any of the votes here. In the first place, the vote of £58,882 for the field artillery cannot be reduced. As a member of the Senate, I most strongly object to any reduction of that vote.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is not proposed to touch that vote under any circumstances.

Senator MATHESON.—I am glad to hear that the vote is to remain intact; and if the Minister of Defence will enlighten me as to each vote as I proceed, he will shorten my remarks considerably. Then there is the vote of £10,260 for machine guns.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is not proposed to touch that vote.

Senator MATHESON.—In my opinion that is absolutely essential expenditure, which ought not to be interfered with under any possible circumstances.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Hear, hear!

Senator MATHESON.—But I most strongly deprecate the proposed expenditure for two 7.5 guns.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Those guns have been ordered.

Senator MATHESON.—The Minister has "given the show away." We now thoroughly understand the way in which these Estimates are presented to us. After most careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that these two guns are absolutely useless for our purposes. They are most excellent guns for specific purposes and ranges, but for our purposes they are, as I say, absolutely useless. I ask by whom were these guns ordered?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The guns were ordered long before the present Government came into office.

Senator MILLEN.—We can get no information from this Government, except that something has been done by somebody else.

Senator DOBSON.—This may be called the no-responsibility Government.

Senator MATHESON.—I have always argued that there is no responsibility in connexion with this Department, and apparently no one pretends that there is, except when we are discussing a Bill for its control. We are then told that this or that necessary reform cannot be carried out because to do so would interfere with Ministerial responsibility. That was the one reason why the amendments I proposed in the Bill last session were not accepted. The fact is that there is no such thing as Ministerial responsibility in connexion with this or any other Department of the Government.

Senator PLAYFORD.—When a Government is turned out of office their responsibility ends.

Senator MATHESON.—That is quite right. When a Government is turned out, members of that Government very often turn round and vote against the very measures they introduced.

Senator PEARCE.—Or stay away and do not vote.

Senator MATHESON.—Could responsible government be reduced to a greater farce? I do not aim those words at any particular Government, because such is the habit and custom of every Ministry, so far as I can see, no matter from what party it may be formed. As I said before, this vote of £24,000 is one that it is of no use discussing—the matter comes before us cut and dried.

Senator PLAYFORD.—These guns are for the fortifications of Fremantle.

Senator MATHESON.—Surely, if these Estimates are of any value they ought to come before us in such a condition that we can exercise our deliberative judgment in dealing with the votes asked for? We ought to be in a position to debate this question, and if we come to the conclusion that the guns are not necessary, to decide that they shall not be purchased. Suppose that after the Senate has listened to me this morning, it comes to the conclusion that these guns are unsuitable?

Senator PEARCE.—Did we not commit ourselves to this expenditure last session, seeing that in the Bill then passed it was indicated that two guns were to be procured?

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator is right in saying that the Government were going to procure two guns, but they were not in the Bill. I may say that I saw people connected with the Department, and told them my reasons for strongly opposing the purchase of the guns.

Senator PLAYFORD.—How long ago was that?

Senator MATHESON.—That was at the commencement of last year, when I came over from Western Australia and heard that it was proposed to place the guns in the fort at Fremantle. The guns were not ordered at that time, but were only spoken of outside Parliament.

Senator PEARCE.—I think that in the Bill of last session the calibre of the guns was mentioned.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator is wrong; there was no vote proposed, and no possibility of debating the matter. I want to know what procedure we could possibly adopt if the Senate came to the conclusion that these guns are unsuitable.

Senator PLAYFORD.—When it was mentioned that these guns were about to be purchased was the time to bring forward a motion affirming that they were unsuitable.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator is not talking sense. I ask him, as a practised parliamentarian, how the Senate could express an opinion on a subject which was not before it? Indeed, the matter has never been before us until to-day.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It was known, and, so far as I remember, it was stated in the papers before the Senate, that the Government proposed to purchase two guns, the calibre of which was mentioned. The honorable senator then had a perfect right to submit a motion on the question.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator is wrong in stating that we had an opportunity to express an opinion on the question.

Senator PLAYFORD.—An opportunity could have been afforded by giving notice of motion.

Senator MATHESON.—I have been watching the matter carefully with a view to expressing an opinion. I have had my notes ready for the last twelve months, and if any occasion had presented itself, the Minister of Defence may be perfectly certain that, whatever Government were in power, I should have expressed my opinion. It is not my habit to keep my opinions in the dark, when there is a possibility of making them public.

Senator MILLEN. — The Minister of Defence suggests that the honorable senator should have moved as a private member a motion which would have led to nothing.

Senator MATHESON.—The Minister of Defence is showing some little heat in this matter, and I should like him clearly to understand that I make no attack on him. The Minister is apparently helpless in the hands of fate—a fate provided for him by a predecessor. In all earnestness, I ask the Minister what means are open to us to get the order for those guns withdrawn if the Senate comes to the conclusion that they are not suitable? Is the person who ordered the guns to be asked to pay for them, and be left to utilize them for the ornamentation of his back garden or either side of his front door? We are supposed to be here controlling the finances of the Commonwealth, and I should like an answer to the question which I have just put. The Minister of Defence said just now that I did not take advantage of a previous opportunity. I now ask the Minister the question in advance, in order that I may take advantage of the proper procedure. What have we to do if the Senate concludes that these guns, which have already been ordered, are not necessary or suitable?

Senator PLAYFORD. — Unfortunately, the honorable senator, like myself, is in the hands of fate; the guns have been ordered.

Senator MATHESON.—Then what is the use of asking us to express a deliberative vote on the expenditure? Is this not reducing parliamentary procedure to a farce?

Senator GUTHRIE.—It is “responsible government.”

Senator PLAYFORD.—The same sort of thing has occurred in the Parliaments of all the States ever since I can remember.

Senator MATHESON.—The Minister of Defence excuses himself by saying that the same thing has occurred in the Parliaments of the States. I know that it has occurred time after time in Western Australia, and protests have been raised again and again. That fact, however, affords no justification for our continuing the same evil method under the Commonwealth.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The past Minister cannot be blamed—the blame rests with his advisers, who recommended the purchase of the guns.

Senator MATHESON.—I do not blame the advisers, but I blame the Minister of Defence for the time being.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Minister of Defence has no knowledge of gunnery, and must trust to the advice of experts.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—On whose authority are those guns said to be unsuitable?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The only authority I know is that of the honorable senator who is speaking. I know the reasons the honorable senator is going to bring forward, because I supplied him with the “ammunition” he is going to fire off. I always give honorable senators every opportunity to get at facts.

Senator MATHESON.—I am very loth to interrupt this conversation, which is eliciting a good deal of information. I must admit frankly that I have received every assistance from the Minister of Defence, and, as I said before, I make these remarks in no spirit of animosity against either the present Minister of Defence or the present Government.

Senator PLAYFORD.—All I say is that it is not fair to blame a past Minister in a matter of this sort; the blame is attachable to the advisers of the Government who recommended the purchase of the guns.

Senator MATHESON.—There I distinctly join issue with the Minister. It is quite contrary to parliamentary procedure for any Minister to embark in a purchase of this sort without the authority of Parliament. I do not care what responsible advisers advise; it is the Minister's duty before embarking on such a policy to secure the approval of Parliament.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The approval of Parliament for the erection of fortifications at Fremantle, and to certain guns being mounted there, was obtained.

Senator MATHESON.—There the honorable senator is mistaken. The approval of Parliament was obtained for the fortifications at Fremantle, and for the mounting of two 6-inch guns at Arthur's Head. That matter received careful consideration, and if I had had any objection to the proposal I should have expressed it. Indeed, I had intended to oppose the proposal, but Colonel Owen gave me information which convinced me that the only policy to adopt was to mount those guns at Arthur's Head. I, therefore, raised no objection to what I had considered at first to be a mistake. The three items I have enumerated give a sum total of £93,142. We have to add to that a sum of £41,060, which it is stated here is not to be expended, making a total of £134,202. That leaves £46,858 available for all other expenditure. Out of that amount, according to the Estimates placed before us, provision must be made for various other items, involving a total expenditure of £87,918. So that the Minister starts off with a list of reducible items involving a total expenditure which is double the amount available for the purpose. It must be reduced, therefore, by 50 per cent. in any case. I cannot see how the purchase of cordite and rifles as proposed can cost much less than £40,000.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We propose to spend £10,000 on cordite, and £22,000 on 5,000 rifles. That makes £32,000, which is rather less than the honorable senator's estimate.

Senator MATHESON.—I was only £8,000 out, but I do not know exactly what the price of cordite is, and I estimated the cost of the rifles at £5 each, instead of at a lesser sum. I think it will be found that the Minister of Defence has given the cost of the rifles without bayonets, and, as I assume that bayonets will have to be provided, it is likely that the cost will amount to £5 for each rifle and bayonet. The honorable senator proposes to spend £32,000 on these two items out of an available sum of £46,000. That will leave £14,000 to be expended on items in this list, which involve a total expenditure of £87,918. It is ridiculous that Parliament should be asked to expend that amount on specific items when, according to the Minister's own showing, he will have only £14,000 at his disposal for the purpose. Senator Playford may smile, but he will find it impossible to dispute the figures.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is a vote of £58,000 down for field artillery, and a great deal of that may not be spent.

Senator MATHESON.—When I mentioned that item, the honorable senator said that the vote could not be reduced by one penny.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We have no desire to reduce it, but whether the whole of that amount will be spent during the year is very problematical.

Senator MATHESON.—The expenditure proposed on field artillery is one of the most justifiable items placed before us.

In the circumstances which I have stated, Parliament has some right to object to the way in which these votes are submitted to it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I can now give the honorable senator the date at which the guns he referred to were ordered. It was 17th April, 1905.

Senator MATHESON.—If they were ordered at so late a date, I have some hope that the order could be countermanded by cable.

Senator PLAYFORD.—To get the guns the honorable senator suggests would double the expenditure straight away.

Senator MATHESON.—I shall come to that later on. In going through the Estimates, I find a number of votes for rifle ranges, but there is absolutely no provision made for an artillery range, unless some of these rifle ranges would be suitable for the purpose.

Senator PLAYFORD.—No, they are not. We are considering the matter of artillery ranges, but we have not sufficient information on the subject.

Senator MATHESON.—Is not that an extraordinary statement for a Minister of Defence to make? We have a vote here for 18-pounder guns for field artillery. They have an effective range of 10,000 yards—about 6 miles. It is essential for any purpose of defence that our field artillerymen should be exercised in the firing of those guns. They must be taught to train and aim them accurately, and the only way in which they can be given such instruction is by practise on ranges. A certain number of these guns are to be provided for each State, and it is almost incredible that we should be told that throughout the Commonwealth there is no place where these guns can be used with safety. No provision is made on these Estimates for acquiring artillery ranges, and the Minister of Defence says that he cannot get the necessary information on the subject.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Information as to where suitable sites can be obtained.

Senator MATHESON.—Exactly; no steps have been taken to investigate the question.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Yes, it has been investigated.

Senator MATHESON.—I am aware that the military authorities have directed the attention of previous Governments to the question, but it has been shelved, and simply because, as I stated last year, in defence matters the Government are unwilling to come to Parliament for money.

Senator PLAYFORD. — It is want of money that prevents us from going farther.

Senator MATHESON. — It is not want of money, because, so far as I can judge, Parliament is quite prepared to vote all the money required. It is because the Government will not come to Parliament and tell the truth on these subjects, and ask for the necessary money. Although the departmental authorities, when these guns were ordered, called attention to the fact that artillery ranges were necessary, and although that notification has been repeated with each change of Government, nothing has yet been done in the matter, and the present Minister of Defence lacks information on the subject.

Senator PLAYFORD. — A range 6 miles long would cost some money.

Senator MATHESON. — These ranges must be 10 miles long by 4 miles wide to be of any use at all. What on earth is the use of buying these guns if they are not to be used in practise?

Senator PLAYFORD. — The guns can be fired all right if they are taken to the sea coast.

Senator MATHESON. — The Minister of Defence treats the matter in a jocose spirit, but the defence of our homes is one of the most serious questions that can possibly occupy our attention. It is of far greater importance than is any social question in the States, yet it is a question to which apparently no Federal Government is prepared to give five minutes' serious consideration. As a consequence, we have the present extraordinary state of affairs, in which first-class guns are ordered, and there will be no means of practising with them.

Senator PLAYFORD. — We will find a way to practise with them. What does the honorable senator think it would cost to purchase an artillery range 10 miles long by 4 miles wide in each of the States?

Senator MATHESON. — If the expense of providing ranges is prohibitive, we had better sell the guns, and have done with it. We have a Defence Force in which no one is effective, because no one is trained. The men of our defence force are very willing, but no opportunity is afforded them to become efficient. I come now to deal with the Department under the control of the Postmaster-General. I have something to say in connexion with a proposal for a trunk telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne. In these Estimates I find a vote of £23,000 put down for the construction of the New South Wales branch of the line, and another of £11,000 for the Victorian branch, making a total of £30,000. There is no indication of the additional amount which will hereafter have to be spent to make the service complete. However, I have an official document, in which I find that the total amount required for the purpose will be £50,000. This particular service is included in a series of works submitted to the Commonwealth Parliament by Sir George Turner in 1902. I think the year was 1902, but, curiously enough, this parliamentary paper is undated. Sir George Turner, as Commonwealth Treasurer at the time, proposed to issue a Commonwealth loan, and in the schedule of works which it was intended to cover, this direct telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne is included, and the amount put down as necessary to complete the scheme is £50,000. We have now a proposal made to spend £30,000 of that sum. When the proper time arrives I shall move to strike out this vote. What is proposed is an absolute luxury, and a totally unnecessary expenditure of Commonwealth money. At present there are a number of works required in connexion with existing telephone systems in the various States, and essential to their proper working, which have not been carried out. In Melbourne, for instance, a departmental committee recommended that the whole of the telephone and telegraph lines should be laid underground in conduits, and an amount of £54,653 is stated to be required for this work, which has not yet been completed. It is, I believe, being carried on slowly, and is not likely to be completed for several years under the present scale of expenditure. This is, I contend, an absolutely essential work, and ought to be completed before we go in for luxuries such as a through telephone line from Melbourne to Sydney. Then there is the question of a common battery switchboard in the telephone office at Melbourne. That is an absolute essential. It was pointed out by the departmental committee that the present switchboard was utterly inefficient. It is the reason, I believe, for half the delay that takes place in using the telephone, and all the inconvenience which subscribers suffer and which every honorable senator has experienced. It is of the very first importance that that work should be put in hand and completed.

Senator HIGGS.—If it is merely a question of expense the fee to the subscribers might be increased rather than have the service out of date.

Senator MATHESON.—The cost of the switchboard is set out in the Estimates at £30,000. That expenditure, which I see receives the approval of Senator Higgs, ought to be authorized long prior to this luxury of a through telephone. The departmental committee called attention to the fact that the switchboard in Adelaide is also quite out of date, and causes a largely increased expense in manipulation, which would be saved to the State if a common battery switchboard were put in. That, again, is a work which ought to be taken in hand in preference to this through telephone line. It would cost £13,000. Then the departmental committee strongly urged that the telephone system in Western Australia should be put underground. That would cost £23,500, and is an absolute essential to the working of the system. That also ought to be put in hand before this unnecessary expenditure is incurred. Sydney, I may mention, had not a common battery switchboard at the time the report was drafted, but curiously enough it has received one since. The estimate for the switchboard for Sydney, as for Melbourne, was £30,000; and I understand that the work has been completed. While these essential works in the other States remain untouched, I shall do my best to prevent the erection of the through telephone. I wish to call attention to the fact that it cannot possibly pay. The revenue is based on the estimate that a person will pay 6s. 6d. for a three minutes' conversation. It would be practically impossible to find in each State more than two or three persons who would be prepared to pay that fee. I appeal to Senator Walker as a business man to say whether it is likely that business persons would pay the fee.

Senator WALKER.—Probably the shipping companies and the banks might do so.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Very often they would pay a guinea for a three minutes' conversation, and it would pay them, too, to do so.

Senator MATHESON.—I have grave doubts about it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The real question is how many persons would pay that fee in a year.

Senator MATHESON.—The estimate requires that thirty-two of these conversations should take place every day of the year except Sundays to provide the necessary income. The suggestion that thirty-two persons would be found ready every day to converse between the points at that cost is preposterous. The margin of time is twelve minutes, so that unless persons spoke every twelve minutes thirty-two conversations would not be held. It is perfectly clear, to my mind, that this telephone service would be monopolized during the working hours of the day by conversations between Ministers residing in Sydney and the heads of their Departments residing in Melbourne. These conversations, of course, would not be paid for. If perchance any commercial man came along and wished to ring up Sydney or Melbourne, as the case might be, he would be told that the line was occupied. We should have no means of testing how many paid conversations were held, and the Commonwealth would be saddled with this enormous expenditure of £50,000 without the least probability of ever seeing any return therefrom. It has been said in another place that that loss would fall upon Victoria and New South Wales, and that, therefore, it is unnecessary for the representatives of other States to take exception to it. But no means will exist for ascertaining the loss of interest on that sum.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If this through telephone line comes under the head of a new work, are not the representatives of every State very much interested in the expenditure of this sum?

Senator MATHESON.—Undoubtedly, because the expenditure is to be distributed per capita. The interest on £50,000 at 4 per cent. would amount to £2,000 per annum. We are entitled to expect that return to the Commonwealth if it is submitted as a remunerative work, as it is. We are told that the conversations would earn sufficient to cover the expense and the interest. In the paper I had before me the interest was put down at 3½ per cent., but I prefer to take the rate at 4 per cent. There would be no possible means of ascertaining whether the interest was earned. So that although the mere expense of working the line might fall upon New South Wales and Victoria, the interest on the outlay would never be identified, and would have to be a dead loss to the Commonwealth. Therefore, the representatives of every State are materially interested in preventing the grant of this luxury at the present moment.

Senator DOBSON.—Do not the officials say that the line will pay 5 per cent. on the outlay?

Senator MATHESON.—The official estimate is that thirty-two talks on 300 working days at 6s. 6d. per conversation will produce £3,412, which is estimated to cover the interest on £50,000 at 3½ per cent., and the cost of maintenance.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Would it be possible for more than one conversation to be carried on at the same time? Has the honorable senator gone into that aspect of the question?

Senator MATHESON.—There is no indication in the report, which I read most carefully, that anything but separate conversations would take place. I think it is likely that, if more than one conversation did take place at the same time, in each case neither party would hear anything of the conversation in which he was specially interested. To justify my objection, and to illustrate my argument, let me call attention to the expenditure of £14,000 made by the Commonwealth on the telegraph line to Tarcoola, in South Australia. This line appeared on the list of public works which Sir George Turner proposed to construct out of loan money. It was constructed without the prior authority of Parliament being obtained, and, therefore, the Commonwealth had, in due course, to foot the bill. Only two or three days ago I called for a return of the traffic on the line, which, I may say, was not opened under any guarantee. In the first year the receipts amounted to £115. The revenue for the first half of this year was £57 3s. 8d., and for the succeeding two months £12 17s. 2d. The line is not earning 1 per cent. on the outlay, to say nothing of the cost of maintenance and working. I maintain that exactly the same thing would happen in the case of a through telephone line from Melbourne to Sydney. We now reach what, to me, is the most interesting portion of this Bill, and that is the question of the two 7½-in. guns and their ammunition. It is proposed to put these guns into a fort at Fremantle, and the question I want honorable senators to consider is whether the guns are worth buying—whether they will do the work which the people of Fremantle and Australia generally will expect them to do. The first point that arises is the object of this fort. That has been clearly laid down by the Colonial Defence Committee—a body of experts who sit in London, and from time to time send out reports to the Defence Department in Australia. They have stated the object of this and similar forts in two or three separate papers. The last one was dated 25th November, 1903. They stated there that—

The object of fixed defences at Fremantle is to deter not more than four cruisers from lying outside the breakwater and destroying the wharfs and shipping by gun-fire.

There we have a definite statement of what these guns are for. The Defence Committee finish up their memorandum by saying, "Some of the cruisers might be armoured." Therefore, we have to consider whether these guns are sufficiently strong to keep at bay cruisers, some of which may be armoured, and to prevent them from destroying the wharfs and shipping of Fremantle. This merely repeats what the Colonial Defence Committee said in other words in their report for 1901, which, consequently, I need not quote. The next point that we have to consider is this: What is the object of having heavy guns at all? Brassey, in the 1904 edition of his Naval Annual, clearly lays down the object. I am quoting authorities, because, whenever I speak on these subjects, some frivolous senator gets up and says, "Oh, you pose as being a military expert." I do not pose as a military expert in the slightest degree, but I do like to look at these things from a practical point of view, and, therefore, I quote the opinions of people who are experts. Brassey is an acknowledged naval authority, and he says—

The principal function of the heavy guns is to pierce the enemy's armour, and either to let in water, or to destroy engines, boilers, guns and mountings, or the men protected by that armour.

We have first of all laid down by authorities the force that we have to deal with; and, secondly, the function of the guns we intend to employ. The matter, therefore, is brought down to a nutshell. Are these 7½ guns capable of piercing the armour of armoured ships which are likely to lie off the harbor of Fremantle?

Senator PLAYFORD.—It depends upon the thickness of the armour.

Senator MATHESON.—Exactly, and I am going to deal with that question. Fortunately, I can again fall back upon the Colonial Defence Committee's report. They give us officially the penetrative power of these 7½ guns.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It is necessary to know what they have to penetrate—whether the cruisers are armoured with plates 5 inches, or 6, 7, or 8 inches thick.

Senator MATHESON.—Exactly, and I have here all the information that can be obtained on that subject. I intended to place it at the disposal of the Minister because I know that he has every desire to do the right thing. He admits that he has very little knowledge of the subject himself—in fact, that he only looked into this question for the first time the day before yesterday.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Oh, a day or two before that.

Senator MATHESON.—The Minister stated in his speech last night, that these supplementary works estimates never came under his cognizance until they were before the other House; and I think he will admit that he did not give any very serious attention to the penetrative power of these guns until I called his attention to the matter.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Hear, hear; that is quite right. The honorable senator called my attention to it.

Senator MATHESON.—And I asked the Minister how he came to order these guns. He told me in his explanation that he was relying on his experts.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I did not order them, but I have no doubt that the Minister who did relied on his experts, and he is in no way to blame.

Senator MATHESON.—The Colonial Defence Committee, in an official document, inform us that the projectile from a 7½ inch breech-loading gun has a penetrative power on Krupp steel of 5½ inches.

Senator PLAYFORD.—At what range?

Senator MATHESON.—At 6,000 yards. For fear that any honorable senator should cavil at the range, I may mention that that is the range chosen by the Colonial Defence Committee as being an ordinary range. I have a cutting which states that three and a half miles—which is about equivalent to 6,000 yards—is a close battle range for ships. In addition to that, in the Boer war guns were silenced at a range of ten and a half miles; others were silenced at a range of 9,000 yards, and the practise range in Sydney is from 4,450 yards to 4,500. So that a range of 6,000 yards is not at all unusual, and is a range at which battleships or cruisers would be likely to fire. Under these circumstances, we have to consider whether the ships which are likely to come to Fremantle harbor will carry more than 5½ inches of Krupp steel armour or not. In this connexion I have obtained some very interesting information. We have to bear in mind, first of all, that armoured cruisers are the kind of vessels that will probably be despatched to these waters in time of war. Out of the whole of the armoured cruisers and battleships in the British fleet—that is to say, out of 107 ships—there are only ten having armour that these 7½ guns could affect at that range. I go a little further than that; and without any desire to suggest that we are likely to be at war with France, I take the French Navy as that of a foreign Power with which we might very well draw comparisons. I find that out of seventy-four armoured cruisers and battleships in the French Navy, there are only nine against which these guns would be effective.

Senator DOBSON.—What is the average thickness of the armour of men-of-war?

Senator MATHESON.—It varies from 9 inches of Krupp steel in English battleships down to 4 inches on the new county type of cruisers.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Some ships have an armour of 14 inches.

Senator MATHESON.—I am speaking of the armoured belt. No ships, I think, have armour of Krupp steel 14 inches in thickness. Some ships of an older type have thicker armour of wrought iron, but they are now out of date.

Senator DOBSON.—Then these guns are useless?

Senator MATHESON.—They are absolutely useless for all practical purposes.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is a very serious statement to make, and there should be some reply from the experts who are responsible.

Senator MATHESON.—Under these circumstances, I wish to put this on record, and it is perfectly well known to everybody who studies defence matters, that Major-General Hutton and a number of the staff officers employed under him were strongly opposed to Fremantle being armed at all.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Hear, hear.

Senator MATHESON.—The Minister admits that what I say is true. I also wish to place on record my contention that it is an absolute waste of money to spend one single penny on the fortifications of either Fremantle, Sydney, or Melbourne, unless guns of a higher calibre than 7·5 are to be employed.

Senator PEARCE.—Was that Major-General Hutton's reason?

Senator MATHESON.—No; the reason, I think—I have it only on hearsay—was that the more you increase the defensive power of Fremantle the greater would be the force employed against it if any enemy desired to attack it.

Senator PLAYFORD.—He wanted only one fortified place in the neighbourhood.

Senator MATHESON.—Major-General Hutton's opinion was that Sydney was the only place in Australia that he would fortify if it were left to him, because it was a naval base. Whether his point of view was right, or whether it is a point of view which we need adopt, is another question.

Senator DOBSON.—What is the price of these two guns apart from ammunition?

Senator PLAYFORD.—About £40,000 odd; and the price of 9-inch guns would be about £80,000.

Senator MATHESON.—Two 7·5 guns, according to the estimate of the Colonial Defence Committee, would cost about £16,600.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That is for the guns alone, but I was taking into account guns, mounting, and everything concerned.

Senator MATHESON.—Then there is £5,600 for ammunition, and the cost of erection would be £12,000, according to the estimate.

Senator STYLES.—What is the effective range of a 9·2 gun?

Senator MATHESON.—The range does not matter so much as the penetrative power at any given range. It appears that the first local recommendation in connexion with the defence of Fremantle was to mount an old 9·2 gun which is called "E O C 1887," and was lying at Sydney in store.

Senator DAWSON.—That is a muzzle-loader, I think.

Senator MATHESON.—No. It was a good enough gun in its day. The proposal was that that gun should be taken to Fremantle and mounted in connexion with two 6-inch guns. But the Colonial Defence Committee pointed out, first of all, that one big gun would be useless in connexion with two 6-inch guns, and that for any efficient defence at all it was requisite to have four guns; and in the second place they pointed out that two 9·2 guns of the old mark would be no more efficient than the guns which we propose to purchase, namely, 7·5. I think the Minister will admit that I have put the case fairly. That is to say, the 7·5 guns which Australia has been recommended to purchase would be about as efficient as the 9·2 old-mark gun which was lying in Sydney.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Are any of these guns quick-firers?

Senator MATHESON.—No; no gun over 6 inches is a quick-firing gun.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Are there any quick-firing guns in Australia?

Senator MATHESON.—There are a few.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There are some quick-firing guns at Sydney.

Senator MATHESON.—That, however, is not the material point. The idea is to have heavy ordnance, capable of penetrating armour at a distance of 6,000 yards, whereas quick-firing guns are short range guns, and do not meet that requirement. When, with the consent of the Minister in each case, I went to discuss the matter with the departmental officials, I was always met with the reply that in the opinion of the Defence Committee the 7·5 gun was quite as good as the 9·2 gun. In 1903 the new 9·2 gun was perfectly well known in England as a first-rate weapon. It is "mark x" wire-woven, and a most excellent weapon; but every time I spoke of it I received the reply I have just indicated. But now, curiously enough, the Defence Committee report in another paper—and I think the Minister will admit that I am not committing any breach of confidence—that the penetrative power of the 9·2 gun is 7·8 inches of Krupp's steel at 6,000 yards.

Senator DOBSON.—As against the penetrative power of 5½ inches of the 7·5 gun?

Senator MATHESON.—That is so. I then turn to Brassey to see what effect our having such a gun would be, because I maintain that, if we make any purchase at all, we ought to purchase new 9·2 guns for all our forts. I found that if we had this gun at Fremantle there are only twenty-five battle-ships out of the 107 in the British Navy that would dare bombard that port. The difference in the position would be that if we had the 9·2 gun, only twenty-five ships, instead of ninety-seven, would be able to make an expedition with any hope of success, in destroying the shipping and wharfs at Fremantle. It struck me that this was a gun which would really be worth having. We have to bear in mind that an enemy would know exactly our armament; there is no use in trying to deceive an enemy who would know our position as well as we do, if not better. If an enemy knew that there were 9·2 guns waiting for them they would be obliged, either to abandon the idea of a hostile expedition, or to send down ships capable of dealing with the situation. What would happen? If we were at war with a country possessed with a fleet equal to that of England, only twenty-five ships any one of which would be able to attack Fremantle with any chance of success—

Senator DOBSON.—And possibly none of those vessels could be spared.

Senator MATHESON.—Not only is there that possibility; but, on the principles of naval fighting adopted at the present day, those twenty-five ships would undoubtedly be most carefully watched by the vessels of the opposing force, and would never have an opportunity to reach Fremantle. From my point of view, therefore, Fremantle, in the absence of some most unforeseen accident, would practically be immune from attack. When I mention Fremantle, I must be taken as referring to all the ports of Australia; I simply mention the western port, because it happens to be the one dealt with in the Estimates.

Senator DOBSON.—What is the price of the 9·2 gun?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Double the price of the 7·5 gun, and the unfortunate fact is that our fortifications are built for 7·5 guns, and 9·2 guns cannot be mounted there.

Senator MATHESON.—When the Minister of Defence says that the price is just about double he is simply making a guess, because he does not know.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Officers of the Department gave me the information.

Senator MATHESON.—I do not think that it is a breach of confidence to say that the officer whom I saw told me that he really had no accurate information, and had only given an estimate.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The officer never pretended to give anything more.

Senator MATHESON.—I wish to mention another fact by way of illustration. It was only last year that the question of the 18-pounder field guns arose. Those field guns were well known in England in 1903, and in August, 1904, I had occasion to ask the then Minister of Defence what would be the cost of obtaining this gun, as compared with the cost of changing the antique guns already in the Commonwealth, into breech-loading guns. The answer I received as reported in Hansard of the 11th August, 1904, was, "No information." That meant that there was absolutely no information in the hands of the Defence Department of a gun which was being largely talked of in England. In July Mr. Balfour had spoken about this gun in the House of Commons, and pictures of it had appeared in the service magazines in 1903; and it seems inconceivable that our Intelligence Department in Australia should know nothing about the weapon. What happened? The then Government went out of office, and the succeeding Government ordered twenty of those guns by cable a little prior to the 16th November. The position then was exactly the position we find now in regard to the 9·2 gun. The latter is well known in Europe, and is being placed on every modern battle-ship launched; and yet our Intelligence Department has not even received from our correspondents in Europe any information regarding it. I saw in the newspaper the other day that the British Government are using the 9·2 gun for the defence of Sierra Leone, and I believe that it has been sent to other Crown Colonies for the defence of the shipping; yet we are told that this weapon is absolutely beyond our means.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Government do not say that; we only say that the 9·2 gun will cost a great deal more than the other gun.

Senator MATHESON.—I should now like to deal with the question of the site for the fort at Fremantle. These guns are to be mounted on a ridge to the north of the town. I do not understand that there is any lack of room for placing the guns if the Department wish that to be done, because more land can be acquired from the State Government. I myself think that the Minister of Defence is confusing this site with the position at Arthur's Head.

The latter is a little, round knoll, upon which it is just practicable to instal two 6-inch guns. It was for that reason that I withdrew my objection to the installation of 6-inch guns. Turning once more to my argument, which was broken by Senator Dobson's question about price, I may say that I then turned to the French Navy to see what the result would be in that connexion, if there were 9·2 guns at Fremantle. I find that out of the whole French Navy of seventy-four armoured ships, only thirteen could possibly lie 6,000 yards off Fremantle—that is, only thirteen in comparison with the sixty-three which would be available for the bombardment of the shipping of that port if we had only 7·5 guns. I do not wish to be understood to maintain that, if we had 9·2 guns we should be immune from attack. But I do say that if we had those guns, it would be almost impossible for any foreign Power to organize an expedition against us with any chance of success; and, under the circumstances, so far as the capitals of Australia are concerned, we might be considered practically immune from attack. What would happen undoubtedly—and this is a very serious question—is that an expeditionary force would never attempt to attack the forts, but would go to some suitable landing place on the coast, and there disembark troops. The Minister of Defence knows that this is the view held by military experts, and it is that possibility which makes the eighteen-pounder field guns necessary.

Senator HIGGS.—Would an enemy take up the railway line along the coast?

Senator MATHESON.—I can hardly conceive an enemy taking up the railway line, which they would probably use for the purpose of attack.

Senator GIVENS.—And import their own engines and rolling-stock, I suppose?

Senator MATHESON.—An enemy who wished to use the lines would undoubtedly have to do something of that sort. But one can hardly imagine a permanently settled place along the coast where such a landing of troops would be made. I do not think I can with advantage say more on the subject. I have tried to make clear the reasons why I so bitterly resent the purchase of those 7·5 guns without the authority of Parliament. What would be the use of my moving to strike out this item? As has been pointed out, somebody must pay for the guns, and the result is that honorable senators, who believe that the money will be absolutely wasted, are compelled to pass the vote.

Senator STYLES.—Could a vessel with 9·2 guns lie far enough out of range of 7·5 guns to be able to destroy the battery?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The 7·5 guns shoot as far as the 9·2 guns, but they have not the same penetrative power.

Senator MATHESON.—The 7·5 guns do not shoot quite so far as the 9·2 gun; but it all depends on the elevation. With a higher elevation, a longer range is obtained; but with a flat trajectory—I think that is the right word—the two guns have practically the same range. But at 6,000 yards the penetrative power of the 9·2 gun is 7·8, and that of the 7·5 gun is only 5½ inches. I had forgotten to say that, out of the ninety-seven vessels in the British Navy which could bombard Fremantle if we had only 7·5 guns, there are only six not armed with 9·2 guns. The result is that those vessels would not only be able to bombard the port, but they would be able to silence our 7·5 guns with a shot or two. In fact, our guns would have no chance against the guns on the men-of-war. Then, again, the best effective shooting cannot be obtained from guns in forts, which, like that at Fremantle, are only 50 feet or 60 feet high. We must bear in mind, however, that the ships against which the guns would have to fire would be on the water, so that, whatever drawback there might be from want of elevation in the forts, the ships would be at a greater disadvantage.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—There are two or three items to which I should like to direct attention. Under the Department of Defence there is an item of £181,060 for special defence material, less an amount which it is anticipated will not be expended during the year of £41,000, leaving the amount to be expended at £140,000. I take it that this vote will cover the expenditure necessary for providing a number of new rifles. I ask the Minister of Defence, when replying, to give some information on the point. I should like to know if it is the intention of the Government, when purchasing new rifles, to be absolutely assured that the rifles purchased shall be of the most effective pattern, and of proved superiority. It occurs to me that there ought to be a good opportunity now to find out what were the most effective rifles used in the late war between Japan and Russia. I have noticed that a number of people who profess to have a knowledge of the inner workings of the Defence Department of Australia, have stated that a large number of the rifles now in the possession of the Defence Force are almost useless, and belong to the category of discarded weapons.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Certainly not. The Lee-Enfield magazine rifles are the most up-to-date rifles.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Are all the rifles which successive Federal Governments have been purchasing Lee-Enfield magazine rifles?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Yes.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Has the Minister of Defence any knowledge as to whether a new and superior rifle is not likely to be introduced to supersede the Lee-Enfield, as the results of a number of tests that have been made within the last year?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No; so far as we know, the Lee-Enfield magazine rifle is the most up-to-date rifle.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The Minister will acknowledge that the matter to which I refer is one of the greatest importance. I have seen some controversy on the point, which would lead one to believe that there is a great deal of doubt as to whether the rifles most recently imported into Australia are of the most effective kind. It is to be hoped that the Government will not purchase weapons which may, in a very little time, have to be discarded in favour of a more improved type. I notice in the Estimates a number of votes for drill halls, and I direct attention to an item of £1,000 for a drill hall at Newcastle, to which a note is attached that the estimated cost of the hall is £2,000. It seems to me that that is a very large expenditure for a drill hall. There is another item of £800 for a drill hall at Boulder City, Western Australia, and an item of £400 for a gun shed and drill room at Launceston, Tasmania. There seems to me to be a somewhat serious discrepancy in these items. It may be satisfactorily explained. It may be that a very much larger drill hall is required at Newcastle than at Boulder City or at Launceston, but I find it difficult to understand how any hall used solely for purposes of drill should cost £2,000, unless it is provided with a number of unnecessary embellishments. My view that a drill hall might be built for very much less than £2,000 is confirmed by the fact disclosed in these Estimates that a room to be used in Launceston for the joint purposes of a gun shed and drill room is estimated to cost only £400. I direct attention to the disparity which is apparent between the amounts proposed to be expended in the different States. In Tasmania the expenditure proposed under the Defence Department is £3,196. Of this amount £1,652 is to be re-voted, leaving only £1,544 for "new" expenditure. I should like here to refer the Minister of Defence to a statement made in the Tasmanian Parliament by the Premier of that State to the effect that while Tasmania is about ten times worse off under Federation than she was before, her defences are costing about three times as much as they did prior to Federation.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Of course the statement is untrue.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Do I understand the Minister to say that the statement is untrue.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Undoubtedly.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is just as well that that should be placed on record.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It has been placed on record in another place.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The Minister of Defence, representing the Government in the Senate, says that the statement is untrue. I believe that it is absolutely untrue, and I am sorry to think that the Premier of the State I have the honour to represent here should have made such a statement. I am sorry also that the Treasurer of Tasmania, in his recent Budget speech, should have made statements reflecting on the intelligence and capacity which the members of the Federal Parliament have shown for the work they have to do. It is just as well that we should have the plain unqualified announcement of the representative of the Government in the Senate that the statement of the Premier of Tasmania, to which I have referred is untrue, because it is natural that a large number of the people of Tasmania should believe that there is a certain amount of truth in any statement made by a gentleman occupying so important a position as that of Premier of the State.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Who is the Premier of Tasmania?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Mr. Evans.

Senator WALKER.—Have not Tasmanian farmers benefited greatly by Federation?

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is not necessary that I should go into that question now. Some notice might be taken of the important difference between the amount now returned to Tasmania from Customs and Excise revenue, and the amount which the State received from that source of revenue prior to Federation.

Senator PEARCE.—The difference is largely due to Inter-State free-trade.

Senator O'KEEFE.—No doubt it is. In spite of the fact that some of the statements made by the Premier of Tasmania are untrue, in common with all the representatives of that State in this Parliament, I am aware that there is a considerable under-current of dissatisfaction in the State as to the results of Federation generally. There is still greater dissatisfaction as to what has been done in connexion with the Defence matters, and with the existing condition of the military force in that State. According to the statement made by the Prime Minister the other day, and according to the Estimates, Tasmania is to be debited with a considerably larger amount for defence than she paid prior to Federation, while, at the same time, she will not benefit very largely by expenditure on new works in this Department. I have given the figures, which show that £1,544 is to be voted for new expenditure, and £1,652 re-voted, making a total of £3,196 for that State, as against a total of £25,223 in Western Australia, and £38,000 in South Australia.

Senator PEARCE.—The amount for South Australia is £4,985.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am obliged to the honorable senator for the correction. I looked rather hurriedly at the column. I find that there is very little discrepancy between the amounts set down for South Australia and Tasmania. I do not take exception to the comparatively large amount proposed to be expended in Western Australia, if the officers of the Defence Force consider that it is absolutely necessary that this money should be expended for the proper purposes of the defence of the Commonwealth generally. While I am willing to accept the official Estimates of Expenditure in each of the States, I direct attention to a much more serious question, in connexion with expenditure on works and buildings, whether in the Defence Department, the Customs Department, or the Post and Telegraph Department. It seems to me that it is unfair that "new" expenditure in the whole of the Commonwealth should be distributed on a population basis until we have a common purse. I cannot see that the system is fair under which, while granting to each State the Customs and Excise revenue collected in that State, we call upon the people in each State to contribute a per capita proportion of the "new" expenditure for the whole of the Commonwealth. I agree that it is not Federal to have the bookkeeping system, but while we do, it is not fair, I consider, to have that system for revenue and a Federal system for expenditure. I understand that this innovation was made last year when the Estimates were submitted. I do not remember the exact words of the Treasurer, but what he said was to the effect that it was considered necessary under the Constitution to distribute all new expenditure per capita over the whole Commonwealth, and that the previous system of charging new works according to the bookkeeping system had been unconstitutional. Probably we shall get some information on that point from the Minister of Defence when he is replying. I am quite sure that my colleagues will agree with me that Tasmania has suffered, and will suffer under the new system. Some States may suffer for a time, and derive an exceptional benefit at another time.

Senator PEARCE.—Tasmania will not suffer under this Bill.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If the honorable senator takes the Estimates altogether he will find that Tasmania will be a sufferer.

Senator PEARCE.—I have taken the items in this Bill, and find that it is not so.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Whether Tasmania or any other State suffers now and benefits at a future time, or vice versa, is only a small matter. The serious point is that it is absolutely unfair that while we maintain the bookkeeping system the expenditure on new buildings should be distributed over the whole of Australia, and at the same time only the Customs and Excise revenue drawn from each State should be used therein. The situation may, however, have one redeeming feature. The system which was adopted last year, and is to be continued, may hasten the time when the bookkeeping system will be abolished. I think that all new expenditure and all revenue should be treated on a per capita basis. I hope that when we come to the end of the bookkeeping period the system will not be renewed, and that all the revenue collected by the Commonwealth will be distributed on a per capita basis, thereby getting rid of a hybrid kind of Federation, which charges the whole of the people for a very costly work in a particular State, and at the same time—

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that the question he is discussing is relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I certainly do, sir.

The PRESIDENT. — The honorable senator is now turning from the expenditure provided for in the Bill to some other proposed expenditure, and discussing the general question of bookkeeping.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is difficult, sir, for me to give the reasons for my exception to certain items in this Bill without discussing the question of the bookkeeping system.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator can discuss that question so far as it relates to this Bill.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I had no intention, sir, to go outside the scope of the Bill, and if I have transgressed, of course I bow to your ruling. In the Estimates we may find a very large sum proposed to be expended in a particular State during the financial year. We are not going to take exception to a proposed expenditure if it is necessary. Perhaps, in the case of the Defence Department, the system of distributing new expenditure on a per capita basis is less objectionable and more reasonable, and, possibly, can be defended with greater force than in the case of other Departments. If no objection can be taken in the case of that Department very grave objection can be taken in the case of other Departments, such as the Trade and Customs and Post and Telegraph Departments. A very large sum—I think the total amount is £35,000—is proposed to be expended upon some additions to the Melbourne General Post Office. The people in other portions of the Commonwealth who think, whether correctly or incorrectly, that they will not receive any benefit from that expenditure, either directly or indirectly, are likely to ask "Why should we be called upon to contribute our quota to the expenditure while the bookkeeping system remains in force?" True federalists, who have gone into this matter, think, as I do, that not until we have substituted for that system a common purse should the expenditure be distributed on a per capita basis.

Senator STEWART.—Tasmania has gained by it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—In that case I cannot be accused of taking a parochial view. I dislike the principle of the system, because it does not exhibit the true Federal spirit. Until we have a common purse for revenue we should not have a common pocket for expenditure; one thing should go hand in hand with the other. There is only one other matter to which I wish to call attention. If the figures of Senator Matheson, and the official estimate of the revenue to be earned by the through telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney, are correct, they certainly give us cause to ask whether it is wise to pass the item. He said that it would require thirty-two conversations on every day except Sunday at a cost of 6s. 6d. per conversation, to pay 5 per cent. interest on the cost of construction and maintenance. I agree with him that it is very unlikely that thirty-two conversations per day will take place at that cost. I can hardly conceive the possibility of the line earning sufficient revenue to pay the cost of maintenance and 5 per cent. on the outlay. I know that a number of business men in Melbourne and Sydney believe in the correctness of the official estimate. But there is one phase of the subject which ought to be considered. It is a certainty that if a new kind of telephone business be developed by the erection of the through line there will be a large loss of revenue to the telegraph line between the two points.

Senator DOBSON.—The estimate allows for a loss of about £1,900.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Is it represented that, notwithstanding that allowance, the through telephone line would earn 5 per cent. interest on the outlay?

Senator DOBSON.—Yes.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am not satisfied that it would, and I feel very doubtful about voting for the item. But for the fact that some Ministers reside in New South Wales and others in Victoria, and find it necessary at times to communicate with each other, this proposal might not have been submitted. The weakness of the proposal is the possibility that a large proportion of the working time would be occupied by Ministers conversing with each other.

Senator TURLEY.—The time should be recorded.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Of course a record would be kept. I do not suppose for a moment that Ministers would talk to each other for the mere pleasure of conversing, or to bid each other good-morning, and so on. If these conversations did take place they would be considered by Ministers to be of sufficient importance to justify the use of the telephone line. But still it is quite possible that the communication might be made with equal effectiveness and sufficient despatch in the ordinary way, either by telegraph or by post. It is not a very strong argument in favour of communication being established by telephone to say that Ministers might want to converse with each other when some of them were in Sydney and others in Melbourne. That argument has, I know, been held in some quarters to be a good one.

Senator MATHESON.—They would simply live in Sydney, instead of being in their offices.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I think so.

Senator TURLEY.—The time taken up by Ministers would be recorded.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If Ministers and heads of Departments had been established in the Federal Capital this proposal would not have been submitted. If, however, the Minister of Defence in his reply can show that the line would pay 5 per cent. interest on the outlay I should feel very diffident about opposing the item. But I am not satisfied that a good case has been made out. No demand has been made by the public for this telephone. Have any representations whatever been made to the Department concerning it?

Senator MATHESON.—Will anybody give a guarantee?

Senator O'KEEFE.—If the proposal were the outcome of representations made by business people it might be wise to authorize it. Prior to Federation a guarantee always had to be given whenever a request was made for the construction of a telephone for the convenience of one of the smaller towns. I know of an important mining town in Tasmania as to which there was not the slightest doubt that a telephone service would pay, but it took a long time to convince the Post and Telegraph Department to establish a service, and satisfactory guarantees had to be given. It is not unreasonable that the taxpayers should ask that a guarantee should be forthcoming in this case.

Senator PULSFORD.—It is quite impossible. No one can say who will use the telephone.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is a strong argument against its construction. Senator Pulsford is acknowledged by honorable senators to have a close insight into the trade relations of our principal cities, and his opinion on commercial matters is always listened to with considerable attention. He says that no one can say who will use the telephone. If nobody knows who is going to use it, we certainly do not know how much money it is likely to earn, and the estimate cannot be based on sound reasons.

Senator PULSFORD.—Is it not an advance on lines of scientific development?

Senator O'KEEFE.—But we might advance in other directions than this. I hope that the Minister, in his reply, will make it quite clear that the line will pay an interest of 5 per cent. on the cost of construction. If he does not, there will be an opportunity to vote against it.

Senator DOBSON (Tasmania).—I think it must be admitted that the defence of the Commonwealth is the most difficult problem with which the Federal Parliament has yet had to deal. It cannot be claimed that we have dealt with it either intelligently or effectively. There appears to be no unanimous opinion in Parliament as to how we should proceed. Some members desire to see an Australian Navy established—about the most costly scheme we could possibly enter upon. About three years ago some members were instrumental in cutting down the Defence Estimates without inquiring how they could safely be reduced. That was a bad start. Others think that if we cannot have an Australian Navy, we should at all events try to defend our ports by floating batteries, gun boats, and shore batteries. There are others—and I belong to this category—who think that we ought to depend upon the Imperial Navy, and at the same time see to it that a number of our boys are trained as efficient sailors. Above all things, I think we ought to have a national army, and that every citizen should be a soldier, and every soldier a citizen. Although I am not going to anticipate discussion on a motion about universal service, of which I have given notice, I should like to read a passage from a pamphlet written by Lt.-Col. Gerald Campbell, of Sydney, on the Swiss military system. It was on the strength of this pamphlet that the New South Wales people recently formed a Defence League. Lt.-Col. Campbell says—

The actual strength of the Swiss Military Forces in "effectives" for an annual expenditure of about £1,120,000 was, on the 1st January, 1904, 530,819. . . . The active army is entirely on a war establishment basis, though the whole of the troops are not actually in yearly training. Our present Military Forces, on the other hand, do not amount to more than about 20,000 at full peace establishment—the actual strength being about 20,000 (much less than authorized)—and cost about £560,000.

Senator PLAYFORD.—How many people are there in Switzerland?

Senator DOBSON.—About 3,500,000—a smaller population that we have here in Australia—

In time of war the Swiss army would be able to take the field at once. In our case, we should have to draft in large numbers—more or less (chiefly more) untrained—to bring up the establishment to a war basis, before our army could properly take the field. In this matter we suffer considerably in the comparison.

An army of 530,000 men all more or less trained and fit for war at any moment for a cost of £1,120,000 affords an object lesson which I recommend to the Minister of Defence. It appears to me that we shall have to begin over again, and inaugurate an entirely new system.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The Swiss are practically unpaid forces.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not care about that. I am in favour of a national army in which the citizens of the Commonwealth shall be made to do their duty.

The PRESIDENT.—Is the honorable and learned senator discussing this Bill?

Senator DOBSON.—I am simply answering an interjection by the Minister.

The PRESIDENT. The honorable senator is anticipating discussion on a motion of which he has given notice.

Senator DOBSON.—I hope the time will come when we shall show some patriotism that will lead us to have an effective army.

The PRESIDENT.—I must ask the honorable senator not to anticipate discussion on his own motion.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not think I am doing so.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If compulsory service means conscription, let us have it.

Senator DOBSON.—That is a remark to which I must reply.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator must not anticipate discussion on another motion.

Senator DOBSON.—But, sir, you allowed Senator O'Keefe to interject.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator need not notice the interjection.

Senator DOBSON.—I do not want conscription. The Swiss people have no conscription. I should like to ask Senator Playford how it is that he has allowed himself to father the items, £32,500 for accoutrements, £10,250 for saddle-trees, stirrups, and bits, and £22,500 for making saddles?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I have not fathered them. I did not see the wretched things until the Estimates were brought forward elsewhere.

Senator DOBSON.—This seems to me to be playing with a very important subject. I have already described my honorable friend as belonging to a "No responsibility Government," but it is idle for him to say that he has no responsibility for anything. When we get into Committee I shall move that those items be omitted. When we have not sufficient ammunition, and are deficient in guns and rifles, we should not be asked to vote large sums for great coats and saddles. The military officers who prepared these estimates ought to be asked to reconsider them, and to give us a scheme in accordance with our needs and conditions. I am inclined to think that Major-General Hutton gave us good advice when he pointed out that there are a number of places in the Commonwealth which it is not necessary to defend, and that we should first of all look after the defence of Sydney, because it is a naval base. I have always thought that as soon as we attempted to defend our ports by floating batteries and shore batteries, we should land ourselves in enormous expense. So fast do improvements in armaments take place, that if we were to purchase the most magnificent floating batteries and shore batteries, and the best gunboats, armed with the latest weapons that money could provide, in five or six years our weapons would be outranged, and the whole of our expenditure rendered useless. I should not like to say that all our ports should go undefended, but I am at a loss to know how we can defend them, except on the seas by means of one great navv. With regard to the Melbourne and Sydney telephone line, I think my honorable friend should give us more details about the scheme, and as to whether it will pay. It seems probable that the line will lead to a large increase of business, and that in a very short time it can be made to pay. Some honorable senators have inquired whether more than two persons could speak at once over a long-distance telephone line between Melbourne and Sydney. I have just had an opportunity to speak to an electrical engineer, who informs me that he does not think that that could be done; and, therefore, I take it that Senator Matheson's estimate is substantially correct. The electrical engineer also informed me that he does not think that at intermediate places the line could be used, if it were engaged between Melbourne and Sydney. It is for that reason the charges over long-distance telephone lines are always so heavy. Between Chicago and New York, a distance of over 1,000 miles, the price is five dollars, and between London and Paris it is 8s.—in each case for a three minutes' conversation. I had intended to say something about the altered arrangement in charging public works per capita, instead of to the individual States, but, as this is a short afternoon, I shall find a more fitting time to express my opinion. I desire to ask the Minister, in regard to the desired change of the rifle range at Hobart, whether he will, if necessary, instruct an officer, at present stationed there, to inspect certain sites, in company with representatives of the local authorities, so that the latter may have the benefit of military advice. I take it that if two or more suitable sites are found, the Minister will then send an officer from head-quarters without delay to make an inspection.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—I desire to support Senator Matheson's proposal to obtain heavier guns for the defence of Fremantle and other ports in the Commonwealth. Indeed, I would go further and advocate our securing the most powerful guns that can be bought. The difference in the expense of mounting would be very small as between the two classes of guns, while we should have a much more effective defence. I do not see why we should not purchase 12-inch guns, because, to me, as a layman, the object would appear to be to keep battle-ships at a safe distance from our cities and shipping. According to Senator Matheson, the 7.5 gun is ineffective on an ordinary cruiser at any distance over 6,000 yards; but if we had 9.2 guns, or 12-inch guns, no war vessels of the smaller classes could get near enough to do any damage, and it is more than likely that the larger vessels could not be spared for such work. It has been shown that if we possessed 9.2 guns only a small percentage of any foreign navy could approach near enough to do any harm; and the object should be to keep even those vessels at a distance. As a layman, I can hardly understand Sir Edward Hutton's argument that the bigger the guns the more likely an enemy is to send big war-ships to attack us. In my opinion, Senator Matheson has knocked the bottom out of that argument by showing that very few battle-ships could be spared by an enemy in case of a naval war between the United Kingdom and a foreign Power. It is a waste of money to buy big guns which are not of sufficient calibre to deal with any enemy that may possibly attack us. Senator Matheson could have pointed out that an enemy, with a vessel heavily armed with 9.2 guns, might, at a distance of 7,000 or 8,000 yards, silence the fort, and then come in and take away the shipping. The result would be the same to us as though the shipping had been destroyed, but the capture of sound vessels would be of great advantage to an enemy. I hope the Government will reconsider this matter, and take care to procure guns which will be a match for any possible enemy. I am sure we all feel indebted, as I do personally, to Senator Matheson for having gone so fully into a question about which laymen, as a rule, know so very little. The honorable senator may be ridiculed by some, because, in their opinion, he poses as an expert. I do not think Senator Matheson does so pose, but, whether he does or not, I pay a great deal of attention to what he says, because he has devoted a good deal of time to the question of defence. Experts are not always right, and there may be influences at work to prevent them recommending what they think would be the best kind of artillery for the defence of our ports and capitals. Do I understand that the 7.5 guns have been ordered?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The guns have been ordered.

Senator STYLES.—Then I should like to see the order countermanded, with a view to procuring heavier guns, even up to a 12-inch calibre. While a member of this Chamber, I shall at any time be prepared to spend a good, stiff sum with that object.

Senator FINDLEY.—I thought the honorable senator was a man of peace?

Senator STYLES.—So I am; and if our batteries were armed with guns with which an enemy knew he could not cope, there could be no greater security for peace. If our batteries are armed with guns which are ineffective at 6,000 yards, all that an enemy will have to do to make a successful attack will be to select a battle-ship armed with weapons effective at 8,000 yards.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—The Senate owes a debt of gratitude to Senator Matheson for what I regard as the most effective and practical speech ever delivered in this Chamber on the question of defence. I am glad that honorable senators recognise that Senator Matheson was not dealing with the particular fortification at Fremantle, except as an object lesson which may be applied to all the other ports of the Commonwealth. The honorable senator has made out so strong a case that, unless the Government can answer his arguments, they ought to countermand the order for the 7½ guns. Senator Dobson, who has suddenly left the Chamber—a not infrequent occurrence after he has criticised members of the Labour Party—referred to the reduction in the military vote which was made at the instance of that party, and in the course of his remarks used, as an illustration, the small military expenditure, in proportion to the service rendered, in Switzerland. Senator Matheson has placed his finger on the weakness which in the past has caused very heavy expenditure for very little return. In Switzerland, for an expenditure of a little over £1,000,000, an army of 500,000 men can be placed in the field, whereas in the Commonwealth, with an expenditure of close on £1,000,000, the strength of our forces on a peace-footing is a little over 20,000 men. It is all very well for honorable senators to point to those facts, but the man who does a real service, is he who points out the way in which we spend the money for which we get no adequate return in efficient defence. The order for these guns was given in April last. Is it not possible to countermand the order, and substitute one for guns of a heavier calibre? If, as Senator Matheson pointed out, these guns are not efficient for the defence of our ports, it would be far better to let the matter rest until we are in a position to buy heavier weapons. If

Senator Matheson's contentions are correct, it is not a mere question of difference in cost, but a question of absolutely wasting the money on 7½ guns. The position seems to be so serious, that I do not think the Senate will pass this item, until Senator Matheson's arguments are refuted, or there is some proposal to cancel the order. We are asked by this Bill to vote a sum of £140,000 for military material; and of course any criticism of that proposal must be of a technical character. We have in this Chamber the Minister of Defence, but, so far as I know, there is no military expert here to give us any information of a technical or expert character. When the Estimates for other Departments are before us, it is customary to have officials from each Department to advise the Minister in charge, and the question raised to-day by Senator Matheson shows the necessity for a similar arrangement in regard to the Defence Department. We pay the salaries of those military advisers, and surely the Parliament which is called upon to vote this money for military material, should have the advantage of expert assistance, so that honorable senators may be informed at short notice on technical points. I understand that so far as the works and buildings are concerned, there is an official present to advise, but, as I say, there is no one here to whom we can appeal on technical points in purely military matters. Senator Dobson, in a veiled reference, charges the Labour Party with cutting down the Military Estimates which were submitted to the first Federal Parliament. But the position in military matters, though it has improved since, was then very bad. We were voting upwards of £1,000,000 for an army without arms or accoutrements, and the Labour Party took up the position that it was useless to expend such a vast sum on a force which consisted mostly of braid, gilt, and parade. At the same time, the Labour Party showed their sincerity by voting the whole sum asked for to provide the forces with arms. The honorable senator who made that charge, knowing, as he did, that we voted that sum for armament without hesitation, might have done us the justice of acknowledging that, whilst we saved some hundreds of thousands of pounds, in the first years of Federation, there were no members of Parliament more ready to vote the money required for armament than the members of the party who had taken action to cut down useless military expenditure when it was proposed. I am satisfied that I have the support of my electors, when I promise that I will vote for any reasonable expenditure on armament, ammunition, and accoutrements recommended by our military advisers. Ministers are aware that members of both Houses of this Parliament are willing to vote whatever may be shown to be necessary for defence. But we require some guarantee that the money we are asked to expend will be of real service to the Commonwealth. On this point, the Minister of Defence has made a most alarming statement. He has said that new rifles are urgently required. So serious is the position, from the honorable gentleman's point of view, that he proposes, later on, practically to amend the schedule to this Bill to enable him to divert sums of money proposed to be voted to less urgent purposes, to the purchase of rifles. Surely the whole difficulty might be overcome in a very simple manner? I take it that the Senate is prepared to accept from the Minister a statement as to what is urgently required, and what is not. If the Minister tells honorable senators that the sum of £32,500, proposed to be voted for accoutrements, will not all be required for that purpose, what could be more simple than to insert in the item the words "and rifles"? We should then give the Minister of Defence discretion to spend so much of that amount as he deemed advisable on the purchase of new rifles. That would throw upon the Minister the onus of proving his capacity as an administrator of the Department of Defence, and it would be better to do that than to give the honorable gentleman power to wander indefinitely over the whole of the votes in the schedule, to alter votes as he might see fit, and then to come to Parliament with a statement which we should be asked to indorse. I am personally prepared to give the Minister a blank cheque, and let him fill it in for any amount which he is able to say he is advised by the Department will be necessary for the purchase of armament and ammunition. A matter to which I think some attention should be given is the proposal to mount 8-inch guns on the Cerberus. My information is that the engines of this boat are almost useless, and the vessel is practically nothing more than a floating battery.

Senator STYLES.—That is what she was designed for.

Senator Pearce.

Senator MATHESON.—The guns are not to be put on the boat, and I cannot understand why the vote appears in these Estimates.

Senator PEARCE.—I should like to have some assurance from the Minister of Defence on that point.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I have said that the guns are not to be placed on the Cerberus.

Senator PEARCE.—Then for what reason is this item included in the schedule?

Senator PLAYFORD.—The other branch of the Legislature did not strike out the item, as honorable members knew we could save the money.

Senator PEARCE.—I think that it is most unfortunate that we should be practically misleading the people of the Commonwealth. We are stewards appointed to provide for their defence, and we tell them that we propose to spend £140,000 on armament. We tell them, also, that we propose to spend £2,000 in mounting 8-inch guns on the Cerberus, when we know that it is not our intention to do so.

Senator PULSFORD.—That amount is presumably a part of the £41,000 which we are told is to be deducted.

Senator PEARCE.—It may be, but there are many other votes included in the schedule which the Minister has intimated it is not the intention of the Government to expend for the purpose for which they are set down.

Senator PULSFORD.—It is a very absurd arrangement.

Senator PEARCE.—I think it is. Every item included in the schedule to this Bill should mean business. If any of these votes are not needed they should not appear in the schedule. If this sum of £2,000 is to be devoted to the purchase of rifles, why are we not asked to vote it for that purpose? I remind honorable senators that if we pass the Bill in its present form the Minister of Defence will not be authorized to purchase rifles, which it is admitted we need, whilst he will be authorized to mount 8-inch guns on the Cerberus, which we do not need. I should be glad if the honorable gentleman could see his way to delay the measure until he is in a position to ask the Senate to vote money which he does need. It is not a matter of great urgency.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We desire to get on with these works. People in all the States are clamouring for work.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable gentleman is asking for money which the Government do not intend to spend.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We are also asking for money which we do intend to spend.

Senator PEARCE.—A delay of a day or two in the passing of the measure will not have been in vain if in the meantime the Minister is enabled to ask for money which is really needed. I presume that the Council of Defence has met on several occasions, and has considered these matters.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It has not met since I called it together and laid my statement before it.

Senator PEARCE.—We have been paying an Intelligence Department and a staff of officers for the last four years, and they should surely be able to tell the Minister of Defence what sum of money is required for the purchase of rifles. They should also be able to say how much of the amount proposed to be voted for accoutrements, saddle-trees, saddles, and so on, might be safely diverted to that purpose. I think the Minister would do well to allow the Bill to stand over until next week, and in the meantime place himself in a position to submit a definite proposition. I am prepared to vote for all the items which the Minister, on advice, declares to be necessary, and even more than is asked for in this Bill. I recognise the urgency and necessity of being prepared for war, but preparedness does not consist in paying salaries to military officers to drill men unless we have rifles with which to arm them.

Senator PLAYFORD.—We have sufficient rifles to arm all the men we have.

Senator MILLEN.—It does not consist in voting money which we do not intend to spend.

Senator PEARCE.—Certainly it does not. I feel very strongly on this question, and Senator Matheson has increased my interest in it. I am afraid that the Minister will find some difficulty in getting some of the items in this Bill passed unless he can put up a better defence against Senator Matheson's attack than seems possible at the present time. Senator O'Keefe found fault with the distribution of this expenditure on a per capita basis. If the question of the distribution of expenditure is to be dealt with at all, it should be as a principle by itself, and not in connexion with the expenditure under a particular Department. Senator O'Keefe seemed to be of the opinion that, defence being an Australian matter, a per capita distribution of expenditure in this Department could be justified, although almost the whole of the expenditure proposed in any particular year might be for works in one State. The honorable senator is unable to find the same justification for charging expenditure in the Post and Telegraph Department on a per capita basis. That is incomprehensible to me, because in my opinion the Post and Telegraph service is as much a national service as is Defence. The expenditure proposed in this Bill in Western Australia is very much in excess of what that State's share of the total expenditure would be if it were distributed on a per capita basis, but we must take into account the stage of development reached in each State; and I remind honorable senators that had Western Australia reached the same stage of development as the other States, there can be no doubt that the new works proposed under the Post and Telegraph Department, and a large number of additional works which have been refused by the Federal Government, would have been constructed by the State Government. The position would then have been that the Commonwealth, taking over the Post and Telegraph service, would have had to pay for those works as transferred properties, whereas under the present circumstances these works will have to be paid for only as new works. It is unreasonable to contend that States having reached a certain stage of development must mark time in the construction of works and buildings urgently needed, because one or more of the other States have reached a further stage of development. That is an argument which I think will not find support in the Senate. As regards the telephone service proposed between Sydney and Melbourne, I do not think that we can accurately forecast the revenue to be derived from it. It is a peculiar feature of post, telegraph and telephone services that, wherever new conveniences are given, the forecast of revenue is in nearly every case exceeded. It used to be urged against the lowering of the postage that it would result in tremendous loss; and it was also urged against the lowering of the cost of telegrams that it would result in loss. As a matter of fact, the reduction in the cost of telegrams has led to such an increase of business that, if there has been any loss of revenue at all, it has been infinitesimal. I am therefore glad to find this new convenience provided for, because I believe the line will be found to attract enough new business to make it payable. I understand that we have the assurance of the departmental officers that, on the figures before them, the line will pay handsomely, because it will lead to an increase in a class of business which is not accommodated by either the mail or telegraph services. For these reasons I have no objection to this particular item.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).— I should like to say a word or two primarily with the object of indorsing the suggestion made by Senator Pearce, that the Minister should consent to a little delay in this matter, not merely in the interests of the Senate, but to enable him to obtain certain information which he candidly admits he is not at present in possession of. These Estimates come before us as a proposition that we should sanction the expenditure of a certain amount of money. For what purpose? Surely, if we have any regard for business principles, we require to know how the money is to be expended! The Minister makes no secret of the fact that he is asking for a sum which he does not intend to spend this year. That seems to me a most extraordinary state of affairs. Why does he submit any Estimates at all if he is to proceed in this way? Why does he not come down and say, "I may require a quarter of a million, but I am asking you to vote me a million, as it will come in handy as petty cash at the Treasury." If our consideration of the Estimates is to be anything more than a farce, we ought not to be asked to proceed in this way. I draw particular attention to the point, because, rightly or wrongly, I fear that the Senate is losing that proper control which it ought to have over the national expenditure. If it were a single instance I should not perhaps have risen to object, but honorable senators cannot shut their eyes to the fact that from the time the Federation was launched, the Senate has never been placed in a position to exercise an effective control over the finances. I shall now go further, and say that, although the Constitution differentiates in the powers of the Houses in regard to Money Bills, if there is one question which more than any other should appeal to the Senate, as the particular representative of the States, it is that of finance. And whilst the Constitution limits, perhaps, the methods by which we may deal with financial questions, our power is none the less recognised and clear. We have absolute power if we care to exercise it. I would impress upon every honorable member who may occupy Ministerial office that this continual slighting of the Senate—unintentionally it may be—is likely to bring about a position which neither the Senate wishes to take up, nor the Government would care to see adopted. It is quite evident that the Senate must do one of two things. Either it must fall back into the position of an ordinary Legislative Council and merely register the financial proposals of the other House, or, unless the Government methods are altered, put down its foot, and refuse to pass financial Bills sent up in this way. I am sure that the Government does not wish to force the Senate into a position of that kind. I believe I echo the opinion of every honorable senator when I say that the Senate has no desire to hamper the transaction of public business by administering a drastic check of that sort. But what are we to do if time after time the Government bring forward its financial proposals in the loose way in which they have been submitted to us? It is clear that sooner or later we must make up our minds to refuse to proceed with business, unless it be presented to us properly. For that reason I would ask the Minister whether in view of the hour we have now reached, and the impossibility of dealing with the measure to-day in Committee, it would not be as well for him to allow its consideration to stand over until next meeting-day, when he could produce the information which admittedly he has not at his command now, and even take into serious consideration the question of whether or not the proposed appropriations ought not to be reduced to the actual amounts required for the public service. As a further reason for the wisdom of the delay I suggest, honorable senators must have recognised that Senator Matheson has offered some criticisms which ought to be answered before we vote a single penny. These criticisms may, or may not, be well founded, but at present they remain unanswered. They have created in my mind very serious doubts as to the correctness of certain items in the Bill, and so far the Minister has not given any satisfactory explanation.

Senator PLAYFORD. — I have not had an opportunity to speak yet.

Senator MILLEN.—No; but the Minister anticipated the objections in very many particulars by his candid admission that he had not the information at his command, and, on one occasion, by an attempt to defend himself behind the very weak plea that another Ministry had approved these Estimates. That, however, is no justification for our adopting them.

Senator PLAYFORD. — If an honorable senator tries to make me personally responsible, I have a perfect right to say that I am not. I only used the remark in that connexion.

Senator MILLEN.—I have made no such attempt. I am acting solely in the interest of the good conduct of business, and with a regard to the preservation of the rights of the Senate, not with a desire to hamper the Minister. These matters justify us in asking the honorable gentleman for that information which at present he does not possess. The question of the distribution of the expenditure on a per capita as against a State basis is to some extent brought under review by the Bill. While I do not propose at the present time either to express an opinion or to take any action with regard to it, I trust it will not be assumed that, because honorable senators like myself do not take any action to-day, we necessarily indorse that system, or place ourselves out of court if at a future time we should desire to raise the whole question in a more convenient way than can be done to-day. With regard to the erection of a through telephone between Melbourne and Sydney, one of the obligations which rest upon the Commonwealth, which has a monopoly, is to see that the reasonable requirements of the public are met. The sound business character of this proposal may be easily shown. If the Government were not prepared to erect the line, and would intimate that they would allow a private company to do so, within a fortnight I could form a company for that purpose; and, what is more, I could get very many shareholders in the Chamber.

Senator WALKER. — Especially if the honorable senator could make them a present of shares.

Senator MILLEN.—The very fact that I had an option of that kind would show what a good thing it was.

Senator MATHESON.—Then there can be no difficulty about getting a guarantee.

Senator MILLEN.—Yes, there is, because the benefits of the line would be spread over such a wide area. The Commonwealth has no right, merely by creating a monopoly, to prevent reasonable facilities being given to the business of any particular section of the people under its control.

Senator MATHESON. — Why do the Government always ask for a guarantee?

Senator MILLEN.—I am not defending the action of the Government in that regard. If this is a sufficiently good business matter for a private company to take up, it ought to be good enough for the Government of the Commonwealth to take up. I apply, if I may use the term, the touchstone of business to the proposal. Would the business likely to result from the erection of the line justify the proposed expenditure? If it would, then the work ought to be carried out by the Commonwealth, and that it would is shown by the fact, which any commercial man in Sydney or Melbourne will attest, that private enterprise is ready to undertake it. That is the best guarantee that the Government are adopting sound commercial principles.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Does the honorable senator think it is quite fair that the profits, if any, should be divided between Victoria and New South Wales, and that the losses, if any, should be shared by all the States?

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator is raising the very question on which I said I did not propose to express an opinion to-day, and that is whether these so-called new services should be charged at this stage on a per capita, or State basis.

Senator O'KEEFE.—This is a convenient time for raising the question.

Senator MILLEN.—It may be convenient to the honorable senator, but it is not convenient to me. Whilst I have no doubt that he can at a moment's notice make up his mind on the most intricate financial problems, I candidly admit that I cannot. This is too big a question for me to come to a decision about without very serious thought.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Of course, if it affects New South Wales and Victoria.

Senator MILLEN.—It is not a question of affecting those States. I think I have made it quite clear to the Senate that I do not desire to-day to express an opinion as to whether the per capita or State basis should be adopted. If the question for me to judge was whether it affected New South Wales or not, I know which system I should adopt straight away. I would say, "I believe in the system which financially benefits my State." But I am not prepared to take that course.

Senator O'KEEFE. — It is a case of "heads I win, tails you lose."

Senator MILLEN.—That, if I may be pardoned for saying so, is an extremely foolish remark, because, as I said, if I wanted to adopt that system which would put money into the Treasury of New South Wales, my course would be clear. I should say at once, "I want the expenditure distributed on a State basis."

Senator PEARCE.—New South Wales will suffer severely if the per capita basis be adopted.

Senator MILLEN. — Exactly. I am not committing myself to a policy which would benefit my State, because I recognise that while a system might temporarily or permanently penalize my State, it might still have a great deal to be said in its defence.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—In his opening speech the Minister of Defence spoke about the supply of cordite for the Commonwealth. I think I am correct in saying that no cordite is manufactured in Australia. If that be the case, the supply of cordite we have, even when supplemented by the purchase which is provided for in these Estimates, will be exceedingly small. When I was at Albany not very long ago, there was some gunnery practice with black powder from the forts at a floating target two or three miles off. It was only when the wind had quickly blown away the cloud of smoke we were enveloped in after a 7·2 gun was fired that we were fortunate enough to see whether the bullet struck the target or not. Gunnery practice with black powder is of very little use. Seeing that this is one of the most important branches of our defence, if there is to be any practice at all, the men should use cordite and not black powder, which militates so much against effective work.

Senator STYLES.—And let it be manufactured in Australia?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Yes.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Surely the honorable senator does not say that black powder is not good enough to practise with?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Surely the honorable senator can realize that sometimes, owing to a cloud of smoke, the men cannot see whether the bullet strikes the target or the water.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Did the honorable member ever see a smoke that did not clear off?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH. — Does my honorable friend think that a bullet will take half-an-hour to travel three miles? A cloud of smoke does not need to last very long in order to make it impossible to see whether a bullet strikes the target or how far from the target it strikes the water.

Senator DE LARGIE.—What is the difference in the cost of the two powders?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I do not know what the difference is, but I know that cordite powder should be used. We now come to the question of the manufacture of cordite, and the question of whether or not we should have a small arms factory in Australia. We are spending something like £600,000 on our internal forces. We must assume that those forces will never be brought into operation except in certain eventualities—when the British Navy is either defeated or evaded. Therefore, if ever we require to bring our third line of defence into operation, we shall be cut off from the rest of the world. We are practically admitting that the comparatively large sum that we are now spending on our internal forces can be useful only so long as we have sufficient cordite and small arms. It is a most dangerous position to be in. The most important aspect of the whole defence question is that we should have, within our own country, the capacity to manufacture small arms and ammunition, so that we shall not be left undefended if ever we are cut off from the rest of the world. The cost of establishing a small arms factory may be large. Nevertheless, we certainly should have an estimate, or the Government should tell us why they do not think it advisable that such a factory should be established. When we were looking over the fort at Albany, I asked whether there were mines there for use in an emergency.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Fixed mines are being given up in Great Britain.

Senator MILLEN.—They were very useful at Port Arthur.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—I think the Minister must be mistaken as to the use of mines for the defence of harbors.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The information comes from our Secretary of Defence—Captain Collins.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—Probably that opinion has been modified by the results of the war in the East.

Senator MATHESON.—Probably what is meant is that fixed mines are being given up in favour of floating, or partly-submerged mines.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—I asked at Albany, whether they had submarine miners to lay the mines, and, to my absolute astonishment, was told that there were none. I said, "In the event of your having to lay those mines, what should you do?" The reply was, "We should have to get submarine miners from Melbourne." The position seems to me to be absolutely absurd. What is the use of the mines if there are no trained men to lay them? It would take a considerable time to take men from Melbourne, and there might be a need to lay the mines rapidly.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That is another reason for the construction of the trans-continental railway.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—In the absence of the railway it would certainly be very advisable to have, at Albany, the requisite number of miners. The position requires attention from the Minister, who should insure that some action is taken. We have, in Western Australia, a military force of only 1,620 men, on a peace footing, to defend one-third of Australia. That apportionment, I understand, was fixed under one of Major-General Hutton's schemes. The number is exceedingly small. It means that if any enemy could land with a superior force he would have practically the whole of Western Australia at his mercy. I am told that many applications to join regiments, especially the Light Horse, have had to be refused!

Senator MILLEN.—What was the strength of the establishment prior to Federation?

Senator MATHESON.—There were about 2,000 men.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—That does not affect the issue. The question is whether the force is strong enough now. A larger apportionment of troops ought to be given to Western Australia, especially in respect to those regiments which men have been refused permission to join. I agree with Senator Matheson that it is extremely desirable that we should have guns of heavier calibre than those which it is proposed to put in at North Fremantle. Guns of a 7·5 calibre are not sufficiently powerful. At the same time, I do not know that cruisers or battleships would be able to bombard Fremantle from the same distance as they would be able to bombard the forts, because in front of Fremantle lies Rottnest Island. There are two means of approaching Fremantle, one on each side of the island, where batteries are fixed, but only the entrance lying between North Fremantle and Rottnest Island is deep enough for large vessels. A battleship or a cruiser would have to come in much closer to bombard Fremantle than to reach the forts.

Senator MATHESON.—It is the ships and wharfs that an enemy would bombard.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—My point is that the 7·5 guns mounted at North Fremantle would be nearer to the bombarding vessels than the wharfs and shipping would be.

Senator MATHESON.—Only about 300 yards nearer.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—The Minister of Defence states that the order for these guns was given last April. The circumlocution of the authorities in Great Britain is proverbial, and it is quite possible that that order has not yet even been put in hand. I should like the Government to get expert information as to whether it would not be advisable to cancel the order and to obtain larger guns. I asked some questions of artillery officers in Western Australia, and they stated that they thought 7·5 guns would be large enough. Probably they were not the best authorities on the subject. They may not be au fait with the latest developments. Their opinion is not, at any rate, so valuable as would be the views of the members of the Defence Committee.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It was the Defence Committee that recommended 7·5 guns.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—But how long ago?

Senator MATHESON.—They recommended those guns at the price, but they did not recommend them in preference to 9·2 guns.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—It is self-evident to a layman that if a ship carries 9·2 guns, and the fort against which she is operating carries only 7·5 guns, the ship can lie outside the effective range of the guns of the forts and simply batter the town and the shipping to pieces. If that be the case, the fortification should have guns at least as modern and effective as would be carried by line-of-battle ships. There are 12-inch guns on some battle-ships, though I admit that they are comparatively few.

Senator PLAYFORD.—There may be more of them in a few years.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—If warships are to be generally armed with 12-inch guns, it would be absolutely foolish of us to put 7.5 guns in our forts. We are assured that the Government desire to do what is best for the defence of Australia. Within the last few months our attention has been focussed on the necessity of defence more closely than previously. The Government can, at any rate, make inquiries as to the possibility of our having heavier guns at our forts, and also as to the desirableness of establishing a small-arms factory and a cordite factory. The fact that no cordite is made in Australia places us in an extremely dangerous position. I should like the Government to find out what would be the minimum cost of establishing such a factory, and also one for the manufacture of magazine rifles. If there were such a factory we should be able to increase our effectiveness, even if communication were cut off with the rest of the world. The highest military authorities have laid it down that there should be not only sufficient arms for the whole of the forces and reserves on a war footing, but 50 per cent. in addition. We have only 30,000 or 40,000 effective rifles in the Commonwealth, and if by any combination of circumstances, an enemy landed a large force in Australia, we should, while able to obtain men to the number of about half-a-million, not be able to efficiently arm more than 50,000 or 60,000. I suppose the balance would be armed with pitchforks and boomerangs. We shall not be safe until either a large number of rifles are ordered, or we establish—as I think we should—a small-arms factory, and increase our reserve of arms until we have, as recommended, 50 per cent. more than necessary to place the forces on a war footing.

Senator PLAYFORD (South Australia—Minister of Defence).—I can assure Senator Smith that I have not lost sight of the proposal to establish a factory for the production of warlike stores and ammunition. I should be only too pleased if such a scheme could be carried out at a cost which would not prove too burdensome; but we must remember that there is such a thing as paying too dearly for one's "whistle." It would be well if we could manufacture our own cannon, rifles, cordite, and all that is absolutely necessary to thoroughly equip our forces for the defence of the Commonwealth. The proposal to establish a factory was not lost sight of by previous Governments, and I have looked up the records of the steps taken in regard to the supply of small arms. I have gone through all the documents which I thought would assist me in the administration of the Department, but I cannot find that any Government has gone to the extent of obtaining an estimate of the cost of establishing a small-arms factory. However, the Colonial Defence Committee, the proceedings of which are conducted under Imperial auspices in England, have thrown the idea on one side as too expensive and impracticable to be thought of for a moment. But I promise honorable senators that I shall have an estimate prepared and submitted for their information.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Why not extend the estimate so as to include the manufacture of heavy guns?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I think that a proposal to manufacture heavy guns is more out of the question than that to manufacture our small arms, considering that the number of heavy guns we require is so small. As to the establishment of a State factory for the production of cordite, an estimate has been prepared. Offers have been received from the proprietors of the Melbourne Ammunition Factory, and also from the Nobel Company, to manufacture cordite within the Commonwealth. To establish a Government factory on the smallest possible scale would cost £170,000 odd, or, say, in round numbers, £180,000; and if we manufactured for the whole of the Commonwealth Forces it would take only a month to turn out all the cordite required for twelve months. For the rest of the year the factory would have to lie idle, and the men who would thus be thrown out of work would, from want of practise, lose their power of manipulating the cordite, and would have to be trained over again. So far as I can see, a Government factory for the manufacture of cordite would never pay. The Melbourne company, who, at the present time supply the cartridges for the Commonwealth Forces, have offered to manufacture our cordite on the condition, first, that they are paid £1,000 as a bonus every year; and, second, that we buy all our cordite from them, and pay for it prices varying in proportion to the quantity purchased. For the smallest quantity we should require we should have to pay 5s. per lb., whereas at the present time we pay 2s. 8d. per lb. for imported cordite, including freight and all other charges from England.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Does the 5s. per lb. include the bonus of £1,000?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No; the bonus is additional, and I say that that offer would not pay the Commonwealth. An increase of 100 per cent. in the price is a little too much.

Senator PEARCE.—Does cordite deteriorate by keeping?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Cordite will keep for centuries if necessary.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Could not a Government factory be utilized for the manufacture of other kinds of ammunition?

Senator PLAYFORD.—What other ammunition is there to manufacture?

Senator DE LARGIE.—Could such a factory not produce different kinds of "fracteurs" for mining?

Senator PLAYFORD.—Without an alteration of the Constitution, I do not think that the Government could undertake the manufacture of explosives for the public. At present I am only stating the facts of the case, and it appears to me that the Government would not be justified in paying so high a price to the local manufacturer. The offer from the Nobel Company is practically the same as that of the Melbourne Company, except that the bonus of £1,000 is not asked for. These represent the best offers we have had up to the present time. The quantity of cordite we require is so insignificant that even if the Commonwealth Government got the right to supply the fleet, the forces of New Zealand, and so forth, there would not be sufficient demand to keep a factory busy.

Senator GUTHRIE.—But the Government could store the cordite.

Senator PLAYFORD.—That may be; but the larger the quantity we stored the longer the factory would be left idle. I have come to the conclusion that I cannot recommend Parliament to accept either of the offers I have mentioned, or to establish a factory.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—Lord Curzon, in speaking of the defences of India, expressed the opinion that that country should be self-contained, as far as possible, in regard to ammunition, weapons and stores.

Senator PLAYFORD.—India is inhabited by several hundreds of millions of people, and there is a big army of 500,000 men to be supplied.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The principle is the same.

Senator PLAYFORD.—But the conditions are different. No doubt in time Australia will have to be absolutely self-contained in this regard, but, at the present time, we are not in a position to carry out the idea. At all events, I do not feel that I should be justified in asking Parliament to pay 100 per cent. more for the cordite than we are now paying.

Senator PEARCE.—Especially when it can be kept without deterioration.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It appears to me that to pay such an increased price would be protection run mad. We can always purchase and store a large quantity, so as to be prepared for an emergency. I should now like to say a word or two about the important question raised by Senator Matheson in regard to the fortifications at Fremantle, and the guns which the Government propose to mount there. I am sure we are all very much indebted to the honorable senator for the pains he has evidently taken in the collection of his facts and figures, and for the plain, common-sense, logical way in which he laid his case before the Senate. Not being an artillery officer, I do not suppose that I am expected to be able to reply to the criticisms of the honorable senator. Up to the present I have had no opportunity to consult my officers on the subject, except in the most perfunctory way. Senator Matheson some time ago expressed the opinion to me that the Government were making a mistake in purchasing these 7.5 guns, and I at once offered to supply the honorable senator with any information which would help him to arrive at a conclusion in the matter. Both the officers of the Department and myself assisted the honorable senator, as far as we could, and now he has laid before us a statement which requires, and shall receive, the greatest consideration on the part of the Government. I have already called upon the officers of the Department for a report on the remarks which have been made by Senator Matheson, and if they cannot satisfy me that the honorable senator has made a mistake in some way—if they have to admit that his premises are correct, and that his conclusions are fairly drawn—I shall have no hesitation, if I possibly can, in countermanding the order for those two guns, and in considering whether or not we ought to procure the 9'2 guns referred to, or, it may be, some other more improved weapon. I trust in the course of a few days to be able to inform the Senate as to the result of my inquiries. This is an exceedingly important matter, and I am very much impressed with the statement of Senator Matheson. The object of the Government is not to spend money foolishly; but, if we are to buy weapons, to buy the most effective for the defence of the Commonwealth. In answer to an interjection made when I moved the second reading of this Bill, I said that Sir George Turner had instituted a method of charging for new works on a per capita basis, instead of debiting the individual States with the expenditure, and I expressed the belief that the right honorable gentleman had justification for the step he took. That justification, which is based on the Constitution, may be found in his Budget speech on page 5650 in Hansard, of the 18th October, 1904. Section 89 of the Constitution provides—

(ii.) The Commonwealth shall debit to each State—

(a) the expenditure therein of the Commonwealth incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance, as at the time of transfer, of any department transferred from the State to the Commonwealth.

But what about new works? There is not a word in the section about new works. Sir George Turner considered that under the Constitution new works ought to be debited on a per capita basis. He contends that the Constitution provides for it, and that up to the time he took action a mistake had been made in debiting the cost of new works to the States in which they were constructed. I have explained the position which the right honorable gentleman took up in October of last year. So far as I am aware, it has never been controverted. Some people do not like it, because, apparently, the practice is an advantage to certain States and a disadvantage to others, but I do not know that any one who has really gone into the matter has said that Sir George Turner was not justified in the action he took. In consequence of the large sums now proposed to be expended in Western Australia, it would appear that that State will gain very considerably by this system; but, as Senator Pearce has pointed out, we shall not have to buy back these works. In the long run the system will be found to work out equitably. We need not expect that it will always give satisfaction, or that each State will in each year have expended within its boundaries the exact amount per capita that is spent in each of the other States. New post-offices, telegraph stations, and other public works may be rendered necessary as a consequence of the growth of population in a State, and the settlement of previously unoccupied country. We must in such cases provide those facilities which have already been provided in older States, like Victoria, and for which we have now to pay under the head of transferred properties. Really, when we come to look into the matter, it is about as broad as it is long.

Senator O'KEEFE.—No one would object to the plan if it were not for the book-keeping system.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Senator Pearce complained that we brought forward a proposal for the expenditure of certain money on warlike stores, and gave no information on the subject. If the honorable member would look at the appendix relating to warlike stores, signed by Major Sandford, he will see how it is proposed that this money shall be spent. We propose only the expenditure of a certain sum each year. Honorable senators sometimes complain that there are only so many pounds down for a particular post-office, when if the item is carefully looked into it will be found that the work will eventually cost a very much larger sum. There may be a vote of £10,000 on the Estimates in one year, by which Parliament will be committed to an expenditure, it may be, of £30,000 for the completion of the work. So in the case of the vote for warlike stores. When Parliament agreed to vote the sum fixed by the Government of the day for warlike stores to place the Defence Force of the Commonwealth on a war footing, it committed itself, not merely to the expenditure of the amount voted in that year, which happened to be some £96,000, but to the expenditure of £524,000 for this purpose. With the exception of the sum of £24,000 for new guns, the vote set down in the schedule to this Bill is merely a continuation of the provision previously approved for warlike stores necessary to place the Defence Force of the Commonwealth on a war footing.

Senator PEARCE.—My complaint was that there was no vote set down for rifles, although the Minister said that it was essential that they should be provided.

Senator PLAYFORD.—It unfortunately happens that in the original statement with respect to necessary warlike stores, there is no provision for rifles. The Government contend that rifles are of far more importance than accoutrements, saddlery, and things of that sort. We therefore propose to devote some of the money set down in the schedule for warlike stores to what we consider will be much more useful for the equipment of our Army than many of the items for which it is proposed that the money shall be voted. I should have been ashamed if I had had the compilation of these Estimates to have brought them down in the way in which they appear before the Senate, so far, especially as regards the vote for special defence material. I should have deserved the most severe criticism that could be levelled at me if this were my work. But honorable members know the peculiar circumstances in which I have been placed. When I took office, the Estimates of the Department had been seen by the then Minister of Defence, and sent on to the Treasurer, who desired to place the Estimates in Chief before Parliament as early as possible. As a matter of fact, I knew nothing about them until they were submitted. I have frankly told honorable senators the exact position, and that when I did see the Estimates I recognised that a mistake had been made, and that it would be a great deal better that a sum of money should be expended in providing cordite, ammunition, and additional small arms than in providing great-coats and articles which could be made up quickly in the Commonwealth. It is better that we should spend some of this money on equipment which cannot be provided here, and which would be of vastly more importance in actual conflict than great-coats, saddlery, bits, and other items included in the vote appearing in the schedule. I have told honorable senators that I am willing to bring before them a statement as to how I propose to vary the destination of these votes in order to bring the expenditure more into line with the real necessities of Commonwealth defence. Senator Pearce has suggested that we might add the words "and rifles" to the item "Accoutrements," and the word "cordite" to the item covering ammunition. I shall be perfectly satisfied to accept that suggestion if honorable senators approve of it. It will give me the opportunity I desire to spend some of this money on items we consider urgently necessary.

Senator MILLEN.—It might save the honorable gentleman some trouble with the Auditor-General!

Senator PLAYFORD.—It would save trouble with the Auditor-General, though, of course, honorable senators are aware that I could get Executive authority for the transfer of the votes. There are certain ways of overcoming these difficulties. I prefer to take a straightforward course, and to give Parliament the fullest information of what I propose to do. Then when we come to the item for mounting guns on the Cerberus, I shall raise no objection to an amendment to omit it altogether. Senator O'Keefe referred to the drill-hall at Newcastle, and said that £2,000 appeared to be a very large sum for the purpose. The amount required is to provide a drill-hall for the accommodation of No. 3 Company, A.G.A., No. 1 Squadron 4th A.L.H., Head-Quarters 4th A.I.R., "A" Company 4th A.I.R., two companies of Scottish Rifles, two companies of Irish Rifles, and the A.A.M. Corps. We are at present providing premises for the convenience of these military corps at a cost of some £300 a year in rent, and honorable senators will see that if we spend £2,000 on the erection of a commodious drill-hall, we shall save at least £200 a year. It is of no use to compare the drill-hall at Newcastle with the hall required at some less important place in the Commonwealth. I now come to deal with the provision for post-offices and telegraphs. I find that £30,000 is looked upon as an exceedingly large sum to spend in connexion with the Melbourne General Post Office, but every one who has had any business to do at that post-office must admit that it lacks necessary accommodation. It is proposed to spend £30,000 on additions, and the vote of £10,000 appearing in the schedule is, I am advised—

A first instalment of that amount towards the cost of building the basement and ground floor of portion of the ultimate extension northwards covering about one-half of the present unoccupied portion of the site. The additional accommodation provided will be absorbed by the mail branch, including special provision for registration, inquiry, and stamps. The work will include temporary iron and wood telegraph office, at a north-east angle, and pulling down present brick telegraph office and rebuilding it at north-west angle of site (corner of Elizabeth and Little Bourke streets).

I contend that that work is absolutely necessary at the present time. I acted for some little time for Sir P. O. Fysh as Postmaster-General, and I was able to see that the Melbourne General Post Office lacked proper accommodation in a lamentable degree. The expenditure of the total sum of £30,000 will probably be spread over three years. Some severe criticisms have been passed on the proposed trunk telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne. Some honorable senators consider that it cannot possibly pay. Senator Matheson has worked out an arithmetical calculation, showing that if we allow three minutes' conversation for 6s. 6d., and the line is occupied every day for a certain number of hours it cannot pay. I do not profess to know whether it will pay or not, but I do know that for many years past the Department has been urged to establish a trunk telephone line between Sydney and Melbourne. We have heard Senator Milten say that he is so satisfied that it will pay that he is prepared to float a company to build it to-morrow, and will give honorable senators a chance to obtain a certain number of shares, with a promise that they will receive an enormous dividend on the money they invest. I am informed that—

The matter received consideration at the 1896 (Sydney) and 1898 (Hobart) Conferences, and at the 1900 (Sydney) Conference the question formed the subject of a joint report by the Deputies Postmasters-General, New South Wales and Victoria, and up to this stage it was not considered advisable, owing to the large outlay involved to recommend the carrying out of the work.

The subject again received consideration at the hands of the Electrical Committee which met in Melbourne in June-August, 1901. The committee reported somewhat fully on the matter, and recommended for favorable consideration the carrying out of the work, which they estimated to cost £49,596.

During the late Government's term of office, the matter was once more fully gone into by the Postmaster-General, who obtained full reports upon the various aspects of the matter. These reports indicate that the line could be erected with 600-lb. per mile copper wire, for a total cost of £39,450, or deducting £4,800 as representing the value of material, which would be recovered for use elsewhere in connexion with the re-polling of the New South Wales section of the line, a net cost of £34,650. This amount would be apportioned as follows:—

£4,400, to telegraphs, as representing the cost of re-polling required for telegraph purposes;

£19,250, as representing the New South Wales proportion of cost of the line;

£11,000, as representing the Victorian proportion of cost of the line.

Estimates have been obtained which indicated, in the opinion of the late Postmaster-General, that the revenue that would be derived from conversations over the line would, at the outset, exceed 10 per cent. on the cost of construction. It was also pointed out that the copper wires which would be used for the line would, if required, be available for telegraphic purposes.

Suppose that we divide 10 per cent. by 2—and that is allowing a very liberal discount on the official estimate—Senator Matheson will agree that 5 per cent. would be a very fair interest on the expenditure. Surely the officers must have based their figures upon very different lines from those adopted by the honorable senator.

Senator MATHESON.—Mine were taken from Sir George Turner's estimates. They were absolutely official.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I have quoted the official estimate.

Senator MATHESON.—Sir George Turner's estimates were amended by somebody else.

Senator PLAYFORD.—They were amended by the late Government.

Senator MATHESON.—They saw that the estimate of cost was hopeless, so they brought forward another one.

Senator PLAYFORD.—I do not know, but I feel quite satisfied that they felt that the line, if erected at that cost, would return a profit. Suppose we take a very pessimistic view, and say that the late Government estimated double the amount that would be received, a very good margin of profit would be left.

Senator TURLEY.—How about the statement which has been made, to the effect that Ministers would take up the whole time? Would not their conversations over the line be recorded against them?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I should imagine that my Department would have to pay for my conversations over the line. I should not imagine for a moment that a Minister would be allowed the free use of the line.

Senator MATHESON.—Do not Ministers send free telegrams?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No; all telegrams are paid for by the Department. Sometimes honorable senators receive telegrams on public business, but they must not think for a moment that the Post and Telegraph Department loses any revenue from their transmission, because all such telegrams are paid for out of the parliamentary vote for the purpose.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Does it not come to the same thing in the long run?

Senator PLAYFORD.—No. It shows exactly what the Post and Telegraph Department fairly earns. It would be unfair to have a system of free telegrams and free postage. The Post and Telegraph Department ought to be credited with its earnings whatever they may be, and the Departments which make use of it debited with the cost of the services rendered to them.

Senator GIVENS.—If the Ministers occupied much time in speaking over the through telephone line, the revenue would suffer to that extent.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Yes, but it is really absurd to think that Ministers would listen all day to the squeaking of a telephone. I can assure my honorable friend that they have quite enough of that kind of enjoyment as it is. Senator Matheson has said that we have no artillery ranges. On almost the first day I entered the Department the head of the Intelligence branch said that we really ought to have artillery ranges if possible. He pointed out that there is a great difficulty in the way, because an artillery range has to extend over such a great distance. Where should we have to go to get an artillery range ten miles long and four miles broad? We should have to go into the interior.

Senator MATHESON.—What do they do in populated England?

Senator PLAYFORD.—I am sure I do not know; I suppose they have an immense area round Aldershot which is useful for that purpose, but I do not suppose they have an artillery range at Dover, Portsmouth, Plymouth, or any of their big cities. I believe they have only one or two in the whole country.

Senator MATHESON.—They have an artillery range near Liverpool, at Salisbury Plains, Aldershot, and Hythe.

Senator PLAYFORD.—In England they may have a few artillery ranges, as we hope to have by-and-by. The question has not been lost sight of. It will be brought before me very soon, I hope, because I asked to be informed whether there was any likelihood of our being able to get an artillery range at the present time. In South Australia the men go down to the beach and blaze away at an old barrel in the sea, but my officers tell me that that sort of training is not so good for the men as firing on land.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.

IMMIGRATION: OFFER FROM GENERAL BOOTH.

Motion (by Senator PLAYFORD) proposed—

That the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator CROFT (Western Australia).—I desire to draw attention to the following paragraph in this morning's Age :—

BRITISH IMMIGRANTS.

OFFER FROM GENERAL BOOTH.

CAN SEND 5,000 FAMILIES.

A notable development took place yesterday in connexion with the Prime Minister's efforts to secure reputable white immigration. Mr. Deakin received by cable an offer from General Booth, the venerable head of the Salvation Army, to send 5,000 families to Australia. Mr. Deakin at once wrote to Mr. Bent, Premier of Victoria, and despatched the following telegram to each of the other Premiers :—

"Have received cable from General Booth, asking whether, if he sends 5,000 families, principally agricultural and allied industries, Australia can place them, probably meaning that most desire to settle on land. He adds that they are of good character, healthy, and not destitute. Of course your representative in London can also be satisfied of this if desired. He expects to have them available during coming English winter. Shall be glad to learn whether your State is prepared to take and place any, and, if so, how many of these immigrants. Am so communicating all Premiers, and shall be glad of early reply."

When making the foregoing announcement, Mr. Deakin said :—"I am very gratified to receive a practical proposal of this kind." Until he has the Premiers' answers to his telegram, the Prime Minister will not say more.

I for one am not opposed to immigration, and by that term I mean the introduction of men to secure the proper development of the resources of this great country. I am in favour of developing our resources as early as possible; but I am opposed to bringing people out here until we have taken the steps necessary to provide work and food for those who have been born here, and have given their labour until the last few months, perhaps until the last year, towards the development of this country. The Prime Minister has pointed out to the Premiers of the States that he can get 5,000 families from England. After having lived for two years in Melbourne. I am prepared to say that I can get him 5,000 families of good repute in this city to go to any State in which a living is promised. Of course I realize that, owing to the state of the land laws, it is of little use for men to stop in Victoria if they hope to get on the land. I sympathize with the people in every State who are in want of work. I sympathize with the men in Victoria who are out of work, and I hold out my sympathy to the 5,000 families in England who might come here thinking that they can improve their position in Australia under existing land laws. The families who are not destitute in Great Britain are better off than they would be if they were in Victoria under its present land laws. It is proposed to put on the land the 5,000 families who are to come from England. Of course it will be pointed out that, not being destitute, they will get on better than they would in the old country. There are thousands of unemployed men to-day who were doing well a little time ago. Owing to adverse circumstances, bad laws, and the gradual increase in large holdings, and decrease in small holdings amongst farmers, they got out of work. That I believe, would be the fate of the heads of the 5,000 families whom it is proposed to bring out here, unless the land laws be improved. Those who take an interest in the state of the land laws, particularly Victorians, owe a debt of thanks to a member of the State Legislature, Mr. Anstey, for the great pains he has taken in bringing together figures and facts dealing with the land laws of Victoria. At the present time the holdings in this State are too large, and the taxation is too small. In his articles Mr. Anstey has so clearly pointed out the position in Victoria that his remarks are worth quoting.

Senator MILLEN.—Where did the articles appear?

Senator CROFT.—They appeared in the Tocsin on 13th July. While I know that some honorable senators have a prejudice against the Tocsin, because it is a labour newspaper, I assure them that these articles are well worth reading. They also formed the subject-matter of a speech by Mr. Anstey in the Legislative Assembly of this State.

Senator MILLEN.—I asked for the information in order to enable me to do the very thing that he desires, namely, to read the articles.

Senator CROFT.—Mr. Anstey deals with the agricultural statistics of Victoria, and shows that while the area of land taken up between 1881 and 1904 has increased, the number of people on the land has actually decreased. He shows that in the following passage:—

The agricultural statistics of Victoria present the following facts as to the occupation of the alienated areas and the farm holdings thereon:—

Year.	Holdings occupied	Acres occupied.
1880	48,969 ...	16,620,900
1881	49,637 ...	18,141,124
1903	43,768 ...	20,577,167

The area in occupation, therefore, increased by millions of acres; but upon the wider area there were 5,200 fewer "holdings" than in 1880, and 5,800 fewer than in 1881.

While some people are talking of encouraging immigrants to come to this country, we actually find that although there is a larger area of land under cultivation, there is a lesser number of people on the land. I know that there is a greater number of agricultural labourers on the land, but they are employed at extremely low wages. Mr. Anstey gives the following interesting figures as to the persons who are settled on the land:—

	1881.	1891.	1901.
Agriculturalists, dairy farmers, market gardeners, and other growers who either employed labour or worked for themselves	38,652	41,287	38,713
Graziers	2,582	4,277	4,664
Wage workers	17,105	21,646	36,453

I point out these facts with a view of entering my protest against the encouragement of the immigration of persons to go upon the land when we cannot find land for them or for those who are now walking about our streets.

Senator GIVENS.—We can find it if we like.

Senator CROFT.—Of course we can, if we take proper steps, which, however, we do not seem to be inclined to take at present.

Senator PEARCE.—We have full power to tax land to break up the large estates.

Senator CROFT.—At any rate, I think that a protest is necessary, and I take this opportunity of making mine.

Senator PULSFORD (New South Wales).—I feel that it would be a matter of the deepest regret if an impression were to go abroad that the Senate as a whole, or any large number of its members, is antagonistic to carrying out the project initiated by General Booth. When he was in Australia a few months ago he made a public statement with regard to the small facilities, and the slight amount of encouragement offered, for the emigration of British subjects to Australia. I remember sending him a private telegram from Sydney to Melbourne, stating that I, at any rate, should do all I could as one member of Parliament to facilitate emigration to Australia of the kind that he desired to promote. I cannot possibly go into this matter at length at this stage, but I wish to express my emphatic opinion that the future of Australia is involved in a material increase of immigration, and that it is the duty of this Parliament to do all that it can at the earliest possible moment to see that the endeavours of General Booth are enabled to be given effect to.

Senator STEWART (Queensland).—I do not see why my honorable friend, Senator Croft, should be annoyed at the efforts of General Booth, because I am convinced that they will have this excellent result—that it will be found that no State of Australia is prepared to give land to any number of immigrants, even if they are sent out free of cost to the Government.

Senator CROFT.—Western Australia is doing it now.

Senator STEWART.—I do not wish to depreciate the land of Western Australia, but really I do not think it would be wise to bring out a great number of immigrants and to put them there as an experiment. So far as concerns the other States, I say emphatically that there is scarcely one of them that can support one hundred families close to each other. Land monopoly prevails to such an extent that it would be simply impossible to settle one hundred families contiguous to each other in Queensland, except on the worst land. The same state of affairs prevails in New South Wales, and in Victoria it is a thousandfold worse. What is the use of bringing immigrants here when we have not land enough to put them on? Senator Best is smiling, but I suppose that he is a member of the land ring, and never did anything while he was a member of the State Parliament to break it down.

Senator BEST.—Pardon me, but I did. I introduced compulsory land resumption in Victoria.

Senator STEWART.—I am very glad that I have brought out that fact. If Senator Pulsford wishes to increase the population of Australia—and we all, I am sure, agree with him in that, though we differ in our methods—he should help to break down the land monopoly.

Senator MATHESON.—We can accommodate a large number of immigrants in Western Australia.

Senator STEWART.—I have no objection to their going to Western Australia, if that State can accommodate them—on its sand-hills.

Senator BEST.—Is there no compulsory land resumption in Queensland?

Senator STEWART.—No. We have a means of re-purchase, but the owners of estates under the existing law cannot be compelled to sell. The result is that when they do sell they charge exorbitant prices for their land. The persons whom General Booth proposes to bring out want free land, as I understand it. I know of no State in Australia, except perhaps Western Australia, that has free land to offer. What we have to do—and I wish to hammer this into the head of Senator Pulsford, and every other conservative in the Senate—is to break up the land monopoly by direct taxation.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—It is a matter of very great regret that a subject of such overshadowing importance as this should be brought on at a time when it is impossible to debate it properly. If Senator Croft's remarks are to be taken as amounting to a protest against the general principle of immigration—and I did not take them in that sense—I am not in accord with him. But at the same time I should not be at all inclined to support a general scheme of immigration for Australia before we have set our house in order. What I understand he wishes to do is to utter a warning against bringing out a large number of immigrants before we are ready to receive them. If that is the purport of his remarks, I indorse them. It would be nothing short of a criminal shame to bring out a number of unfortunate people until we have so ordered our affairs that there will be a reasonable opportunity of their being absorbed in the ordinary channels of industry. The matter is one of extreme importance, and I hope at an early date to have an opportunity to bring it under the notice of the Senate for discussion upon a definite motion.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I cannot allow the debate to close without calling attention to this simple fact: We, in Western Australia, are prepared to give a most hearty welcome to the whole of the 5,000 immigrants whom it is contemplated to send out to Australia. If there are other States in which land is not available, we, at any rate, have large areas of most excellent land for that purpose, and I take the opportunity to say that such immigrants would receive a most hearty welcome in the State which I represent.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—If it had not been for the remarks of Senator Stewart, I should not have troubled the Senate by joining in this discussion. On recent occasions we have tried to put down what is known as the "stinking fish" party in Australia. Senator Stewart appears to be the latest recruit of that ignoble army. He has recently been in Western Australia, and yet he talks about the sand-hills of that country as though the State had no good agricultural land to offer. One can only assume that he was so blind with prejudice that he could not see around him at the time he was in the West. I do not know what quantity of good farming land may be available in other States, but in Western Australia I can assure honorable senators that there is any quantity available, Immigrants of the proper kind will be welcomed; and I do not wish it to go forth that the party to which I belong takes a contrary view. There is plenty of room in Western Australia for suitable immigrants.

Senator FINDLEY.—Then why is not provision made for the unemployed in that State?

Senator DE LARGIE.—We have found work for a very large number of Victoria's unemployed. Western Australia, with, perhaps, Queensland in a lesser degree, is the only State in Australia which is doing anything in the way of assisting immigration. Every week selected immigrants of the right type arrive, and are settled on the land, and, all the conditions being observed, there will be plenty of room for the 5,000 which it is proposed to send out, if they are farmers and desire to go on the land.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I agree with Senator Pulsford and others that it is extremely desirable to have a large population. It would be exceedingly good for Australia and the Empire if, instead of 4,000,000 there were 40,000,000 prosperous and happy people within the Commonwealth. But how are we going to enable 40,000,000, or any large increase on our present number, to live in that comfort, happiness, and prosperity we desire for all our citizens? Will Senator Pulsford, and others who think with him, assist to bring about that happy result? If 1,000,000 were added to the population to-morrow, the result would be a large increase in the crop of human misery, simultaneously with an enormous advance in the value of private property and land.

Senator WALKER.—The debt per head would be reduced.

Senator GIVENS.—What does it matter whether forty or one hundred people owe money, if they cannot earn enough to make the burden lighter? Doubtless Senator Walker, as a bank director, would welcome a large increase in the population, seeing that thereby mortgages would be largely enhanced in value. There is only one way to make a large population prosperous, and that is to free the land for their occupation. The compulsory purchase of large estates and the subsequent cutting of them up, would not settle the question, because there would be nothing to prevent the whole of the land gravitating back into a few hands.

Senator BEST.—There would be a great deal to prevent that.

Senator GIVENS.—In Victoria, I believe, there is a law that only a certain amount of Mallee land shall be held by one person; but that law has been evaded wholesale in the most shameful manner. The proper method is to impose a stiff graduated land tax. It has been suggested that it is for the States and not for the Commonwealth Parliament to open up the lands for the people of Australia, or for any new population. In my opinion, this is a question with which we have ample power to deal; indeed, I think the Federal Parliament is the power to most effectually deal with it. But until there is a stiff graduated land tax—

Senator PLAYFORD.—There is a land tax already in South Australia.

Senator GIVENS.—I do not want a land tax in isolated portions of the Commonwealth, but throughout the whole of Australia.

Senator PLAYFORD. — And “double-bank” those already taxed?

Senator GIVENS.—The money would be returned to the States, and local taxation could then be remitted.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The money would never be returned once the Commonwealth got it.

Senator GIVENS. — A good deal of money is returned to the States now. The desire is not to impose a land tax for the sake of raising an enormous revenue, but for the national purpose of making Australia prosperous and happy; indeed, I should like to see such a tax rendered inoperative by the cutting up of estates. If we leave this national duty to the six Parliaments it will never be done, at any rate efficiently done, owing to the impossibility of having a uniform impost. But the Commonwealth Parliament, with its democratic Upper Chamber, can carry out such a work most effectively. If we had such a tax we should have no cause to complain of unemployed, or have the slightest fear of any large influx of population. We should welcome all immigrants of good character, because they would enable us to exploit the national resources of the country for the national well-being, instead of for the sole benefit of a few land-grabbers.

Senator BEST (Victoria).—I deeply regret that a note has been sounded by one or two honorable senators which might lead strangers to suppose that in Victoria there is not ample room for settlement, and that facilities are not afforded to immigrants.

Senator GIVENS.—In Victoria good land cannot be obtained under £70 an acre.

Senator BEST.—In Victoria there is room on the land for the settlement of millions. Moreover, when once an influx of agriculturists can be secured, public opinion will demand the compulsory resumption of estates to enable settlement to take place.

Senator FINDLEY. — Why cannot the people already in the State bring about that result?

Senator BEST.—In Victoria there has always been an anxious desire to encourage those who wish to settle on the land.

Senator FINDLEY.—Not so; the State Upper House has always blocked the way.

Senator BEST.—I desire to say that suitable immigrants will always receive every encouragement. At this hour I cannot go into the question at length; but Senator Croft's protest must not be taken as an expression of opinion from this Chamber that we desire to discourage immigration. I agree with Senator Croft that some direct assurance must be given to these 5,000 families, provided they are of the right stamp, that facilities for settlement will be afforded. I have no doubt that every encouragement will be given to suitable men; and the object of General Booth's cable is, I assume, to enable the Prime Minister to consult with the various State Premiers, so that steps may be taken in that direction.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House of Representatives.

Friday, 15 September, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

SLANDERS ON AUSTRALIA.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Has the attention of the Prime Minister been called to an article in Wednesday's Herald, describing the prejudice against Australians existing in South Africa, and fostered by the South African press? Has he any means of ascertaining how far the South African press is still owned and controlled by the Rand mining ring, and has he any means of correcting the calumnies circulated in South Africa with regard to Australia, its public policy, and its administration?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have read the article in question. It appeared to give a very reasonable and temperate account of some very unfortunate experiences. As to the proprietorship of the South African press, I have only the same sources of information as are possessed by other honorable members; but the Agent-General for New South Wales has, within the last few days, officially reported to his Government that the influence of the mine-owners referred to, and others, in the London money market is distinctly hostile to Australia.

Mr. FISHER.—Thank God!

Mr. DEAKIN.—I feel disposed to offer thanks neither for the existence of that body nor for its operation against Australia. I am not in a position to say whether the current statement that the same influences control the press of South Africa is correct, though it appears quite likely that it may be so. It is very hard to say what means we possess of defending ourselves in another part of the Empire against the attacks of privately interested parties. We can neither treat them as official nor afford to entirely ignore them.

Mr. THOMAS.—Why not?

Mr. DEAKIN.—South Africa is part of the Empire to which we belong, and we cherish towards its people the friendliest feelings. We have none but the best wishes for its development, and if it were in our power to take action here to assist it, we should do so most gladly. If we heard that country slandered by any one in Australia or outside, we should defend it.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But why should we not look after our people abroad?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have a right to expect similar treatment from the people of South Africa, and if we do not receive it, I should not disdain to avail myself of any opportunities to represent to them the real course of events in Australia, and the nature of its legislation.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURE.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY. — Has the Prime Minister had his attention drawn to the following report in the Age of a speech by Mr. Graham, M.L.A.?

He believed that if a poll on Federation were taken in Victoria to-morrow there would be a greater majority for secession than there was at the referendum taken for Federation. He was hoping that something would come along to make the Federal Parliament mend its way. If not, he felt certain that something would arrive to dissolve the union. Already there were cries for secession in Queensland, Western Australia, and Tasmania. If the extravagance now going on in the Federal Parliament were not stopped he believed the public would rise and demand either a dissolution or an amendment of the Constitution.

Will the honorable and learned gentleman bring this honorable member to the bar of of the House to prove his statement about our extravagance? It seems to me that something should be done to make him prove it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Any one who set out to prove such a statement would find that he had undertaken a very large contract indeed. Another report of the honorable member's speech contains a passage which perhaps explains the comments which the honorable member for Darwin has read. In it he says that he had always been opposed to Federation, and did his best to prevent the passing of the Constitution Bill. Apparently he now seeks to justify that action.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Has the Prime Minister noticed, in the Launceston Daily Telegraph of the 13th September, the statement of the Treasurer of Tasmania, that £1,500,000 has been spent by the Federation on non-productive works, which showed how money had been wasted? After having got off a lot of oratorical tripe, he is reported to have said—

A million and a half had been spent on non-reproductive works, which showed how money had been wasted. He felt, as Treasurer, that he was justified, to a certain extent, in using the language he did. It was time that leading statesmen should express themselves in strong terms.

Has the Prime Minister any reply to make to those statements?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The allusion to unproductive expenditure can refer only to expenditure on defence works, which have been carried out by the Commonwealth from revenue instead of with loan money. Technically, such works may be described as unproductive, but I think the people of Australia will justify the expenditure which has already taken place—I do not recollect the exact amount—and more if necessary. In reply to such comments as have just been read, I would refer our critics to the remarks of a most capable and disinterested judge, the right honorable member for Balaclava, who, in leaving Australia, gave it as his testimony that the most unreasonable and carping criticism to which he had been exposed was that of the State Treasurers.

ADJOURNMENT (Formal).

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have received an intimation from the honorable member for Parramatta that he desires to move the adjournment of the House to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, viz., "The necessity for amending section 3, sub-section g, of the Immigration Restriction Act."

Five honorable members having risen in their places—

Question proposed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I wish to assure the Prime Minister that the action which I take this morning is taken in no captious or party spirit, but with a view to elicit from him, if possible, a definite statement of the intentions of the Government in regard to the amendment of the section known as the "six hatters" section. Nowadays we are all coming to recognise more and more our vulnerability to attack from the Eastern nations. The results of the recent Russo-Japanese war and the tremendous developments which have taken place of late years in Eastern countries show us that the possession of an empty continent, instead of being a source of unalloyed happiness, to us is a menace, and that unless we do something to fill Australia with a happy and prosperous people, our position in the eyes of the world will become more and more insecure as years go by. This is the first time during the five years that I have occupied a seat in this Chamber that I have moved the adjournment to discuss a matter of public policy, and I take this somewhat unusual course now in the performance of what I regard as an obligation to do all I can to elicit a definite statement from the Prime Minister on the important matter to which I wish to refer. Another consideration which has prompted me to this action is the very evident desire of the States to remedy the condition of affairs to which I have referred. The Governments of New South Wales and Victoria, in particular, are doing all they can to attract to these shores persons whom it is hoped will build up a prosperous and contented yeomanry here, but it is necessary that they shall have the support, both tacit and active, of the Commonwealth Government and Parliament. Unless we aid and buttress their efforts, I am afraid that all they can do will be of little avail. It is with a view to getting the Prime Minister to say whether his Government are definitely in harmony with the Governments of the States in this desire to populate Australia, and are ready to remove the harassing restrictions which now prevent the free ingress of free people of our own race, kith, and kin, that I have moved the adjournment.

Mr. FISHER.—Will the honorable member say what he thinks would be the proper thing to do?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am in accord with the honorable member's leader in this matter, and before arguing in support of my position, I will quote what the honorable member for Bland has said. The late Minister of Trade and Customs, in speaking in this Chamber the other day, said that something should be done to amend the Immigration Restriction Act by removing needless restrictions, and at the same time safeguarding and securing the objects which were sought to be attained when the measure was under the consideration of Parliament. The honorable member for Bland replied that he thought they, the Labour Party, could meet the honorable member. The position of the honorable member for Gippsland was that to prevent men coming here under contract in a proper way was to prohibit all immigration, and the honorable member for Bland, in an interview published in a newspaper a little later, stated in reply to this criticism—

I would like to know exactly what Mr. McLean's ideas are. Of course, he did not go into details, and was not able to do so, but, so far as I am concerned, it seems to me that the position taken up by the Labour Party can be met if men are prevented from coming in under agreement to take the place of men who may be on strike, or from coming in at rates of wages below the standard ruling in Australia, or after having been deceived respecting the conditions obtaining in the Commonwealth.

I am prepared to go the full length which the honorable member would go. That, I take it, was the original intention of Parliament when the measure was under consideration. But paragraph g has been so framed that all persons who come here under contract, no matter what its terms, are shut out. Only lately, we had an instance of how the provision operates to the detriment and disadvantage of Australia, in the case of a groom, who came out here in charge of some horses. I do not ask for the repeal of this section, but for its amendment in the direction indicated. I think that we should recast it in such a way as to make it express exactly what we mean.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member wants to put a glove on the iron hand.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I want the public to understand exactly what we mean, and to do away with a drag-net provision, which has effects far beyond the intentions of this Parliament. As it now stands, the Act prohibits the introduction of all contract labour, no matter how legitimate, or how desirable it may be, and I am calling attention to this fact, in the hope that the defect may be speedily remedied. The original object of the provision was to deal justly with the matter of contract labour, with a view to preserving our present conditions of Australian life. I hope there is no man in this Chamber who wishes to degrade them. No man associated with me wishes to do so. I would not be any party to interfering with the high standard of civilized life, and industrial comfort which we have already established in Australia. At the same time, we need not put a bar sinister upon any man who takes the precaution before he comes here, to insure that he shall have work awaiting him upon his arrival. It is impossible to administer the Act as it ought to be administered, and consequently it is continually landing us in serious trouble. I do not think that all the difficulty has been due to the faulty construction of the Act. A great deal of it has been attributable to foolish administration. I would refer, by way of illustration, to the case of the six hatters. Any man who had desired to carry out the Act smoothly would have been able to obviate all the difficulties that arose in connexion with the introduction of the six hatters. All the arrangements that had to be made after the men arrived in Australia should have been provided for prior to their reaching their destination. For instance, the administrator for the time being ought to have known when these men reached their first point of contact with Australia, and if he had had any desire to work smoothly, he would have communicated with the employer concerned, instead of sitting supinely in his office and allowing matters to take their course. Events proved that there was no need for any interference with these men, and all trouble might have been avoided if the slightest common sense had been brought to bear. It was one of the boasts of Sir Edmund Barton, when the Bill was before the House, that it would be administered with common sense, but very little of that quality has been displayed. When the Bill was passing through the House, attention was directed to the harshness of some of its provisions, and it was pointed out that it might operate disadvantageously. Sir Edmund Barton's reply to these criticisms was:—

Governments must be credited with common-sense, or it is no use committing to them the administration of such measures at all. This amount of common-sense and discretion must be credited to the present Government and its successors, that they will discriminate between those cases in which desirable civilized immigrants are seeking admission, and cases in which those seek admission whose presence is baneful to us.

The Act is being so administered as to keep out desirable civilized immigrants—men of the very class that we most need in Australia. It is being so construed as to prevent these people from coming here except by evading the law. Take the case of the groom who recently came from England in charge of some horses. He had to get what has been described as a "ticket-of-leave."

Mr. DEAKIN.—He had not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I venture to say that he had.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He was not under the necessity to obtain a certificate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—As a fact, he had a certificate with him. The certificate was delivered to him by the Agent-General of New South Wales, who was acting for the Federal Government. The Prime Minister has declared that there was no reason why the groom should obtain an exemption certificate, but when the honorable and learned member for Wannon asked him subsequently whether it was necessary that such certificates should be granted, he said "Yes, but they were not generally given to British people."

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is not what was said; I will explain the matter presently.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The groom referred to, after having arrived here, had a letter addressed to him by the Prime Minister, under date 28th August, as follows:—

With reference to your visit to the Commonwealth with horses for a resident of New South Wales, in connexion with which a certificate of exemption was issued to you by the Acting Agent-General for New South Wales, I am directed to inform you that that document was issued under a misconception by Mr. Coghlan, who was informed on the 14th July last that there was no necessity for the issue of a certificate of exemption to you. There is, therefore, no restriction on your remaining in the Commonwealth should you desire to do so.

The groom makes this very sapient comment on the matter:—

If I made a mistake about my horses, I'd get the sack; why doesn't your Agent-General get the sack?

I venture to say that the Prime Minister has improperly blamed Mr. Coghlan, because this groom undoubtedly came within the restrictions imposed by the Act. He contracted in England to bring out certain horses, and he worked under that contract in Australia right up to the point of the delivery of the horses on the station. He is still under contract, and he will remain so until he returns to England. If that case does not come within the restrictive provisions of the Act, I do not understand them. This groom contracted in England to perform manual labour, he was to work in Australia under that contract, and therefore Mr. Coghlan did right in issuing a certificate to him.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member has not stated that point correctly. I said that the Agent-Generals were wrong, because they had already been told that the certificates they were to give were not to be issued under the section referred to.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is an entirely new point. If the Prime Minister can make that clear, he will go far towards explaining the matter. Nothing appears in his letter with regard to that. He merely said that the exemption certificate was not necessary, and that the Agent-General for New South Wales had acted under a misapprehension. I contend that the groom, in coming out here under contract to deliver certain horses at a station in New South Wales, would have violated the Act unless he had obtained an exemption certificate. I would point out that if a man bring horses here, and turn them out free, we welcome the horses, but we will not have the man.

Mr. HUME COOK.—That is nonsense.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I admit that it is nonsense, but it is a fact. The nonsense consists in such a thing being possible under the Act. In making aliens of those who belong to our own race over the seas, we are cutting right across the grain of our feelings of loyalty to the Empire. Whatever we may do with regard to people of other races—I do not think we need go so far as we are going with regard to many of them—we have no right, by statute, to write down as aliens men who belong to the same race as we do. We have had a man walking about Australia for weeks unable to move a foot from the fear that he might be cast into gaol. The fact that it is stated that the certificate was issued to the groom by the Agent-General of New South Wales under a misapprehension, shows that it is impossible to satisfactorily administer the Act, and we need not wonder that the mistakes committed are used to our detriment in places where the local circumstances are not known or understood. We know what occurred in connexion with the six hatters case, and what use has been made of the facts. One Australian gentleman, who was recently in England, has stated that what was done in regard to the six hatters, has cost us £1,000,000 for each of the men concerned.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The misrepresentation on the subject may have done that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There has been no misrepresentation whatever.

Mr. MAUGER.—The gentleman referred to by the honorable member is an arch misrepresenter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is amazing to hear the honorable member for Melbourne Ports criticising persons whom he is unable to understand. To hear the honorable member criticising the Rev. Dr. Fitchett is to listen to a pigmy criticising a giant. Before the honorable member indulges in expressions of condemnation and contempt in regard to Dr. Fitchett, he should read what he has said.

Mr. MALONEY.—We have read what he said.

Mr. CARPENTER.—He has grossly libelled Australia.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! I have hesitated to interrupt the honorable member for Parramatta, because I did not desire to encroach upon the time for which he is permitted to address the House. Honorable members are, however, indulging in so many interjections as to make a considerable inroad upon the time allowed under the Standing Orders to the honorable member addressing the House, and I would ask them not to continue their interruptions.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not propose to take up more than the time allowed under the Standing Orders, because my purpose will have been accomplished if I obtain from the Prime Minister, as I hope to do, a definite statement with regard to the intentions of the Government. No man has made a more valiant defence of Australia than has Dr. Fitchett.

Mr. MAUGER.—Recently, but not at first.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member cannot regard the statement that was made the other day as anything more than an apology for a gross administrative blunder, which has done more than anything else to damage the reputation of Australia. We ought to alter this section, so as to provide that there shall be no brand of "alien" upon any man of our own race who comes here under legitimate contract.

The groom and the six hatters, to whom reference has so frequently been made, came from the old country—from the land whence many of us sprang, and to which we are proud to belong. The people there acknowledge the same King that we do; they have the same literature, the same history is behind them, and they believe in the same religion. Racial sympathy is the very essence of loyalty, and therefore I say that we ought to take no action which will make any of our kith and kin from over the sea aliens when they tread upon Australian shores. Recently in this Parliament we have been taking action in the direction of coming into closer relations with the rest of the Empire. What other meaning has the new contract for mail services, as to which we have just increased our subsidy by £50,000 a year? Need I remind honorable members that we have also increased our subsidy to the Imperial Navy by more than £60,000 a year, and that the Prime Minister never ceases in his advocacy of preferential trade as a means of drawing the Empire closer together? Only lately we have shown what we think of the Empire as a whole by fighting for it upon distant shores. Surely in an Empire which is good enough to fight for—an Empire which we should do our best to make more unified and homogeneous, more cohesive, strong, and free—we should do nothing which will brand any citizen of it as an alien when he happens to move from a particular locality to another; that, however, is the effect of section 3 of the Immigration Restriction Act.

Mr. WATSON.—Where does it do that?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I say that what is known as the contract section does that. Under that provision we regard a man who comes to Australia under contract as an alien, and we say that he must go to prison if he does not clear out.

Mr. FRAZER.—We say that the moment he breaks his bond he may enter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The more I look at the section the more it seems to me to cut right across the doctrine of personal rights, which has been one of the choicest heritages of the British race for a thousand years past. The sooner we take from it that sinister aspect the better it will be for us. We have here an empty continent, and if we wish Australia to be an outpost of the Empire we can only achieve our object by settling it with people who will be so contented with their conditions as to cause them to spring to its defence the moment it is menaced from outside. We may build Tariff walls, education walls, and immigration restriction walls; but we shall at last have to deal with the sullen, hungry hordes of people outside. Unless we are able to face them with force at the critical time, all that we can do will be of little avail when our hour of trial comes. I am afraid that in a young country like Australia, isolated as we are from the rest of the world, we are apt to get lulled into a condition of false security, and to allow our views to get out of perspective. Only the other day I read in the Contemporary Review an article upon the act of death. A man who was dying was depicted as saying that if he had a pen he would write how pleasant and easy a thing it was to die. I venture to say that it may be just as easy and pleasant a thing for a nation to die as for an individual, and that when we think we are most secure—when we are wrapped up in our self-satisfaction—then it is that our danger becomes the keenest.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—This sounds like a speech which I delivered in 1901.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I should be very glad to hear the honorable and learned member in 1905. That I have dared to tread in the footsteps of my honorable and learned friend may be regarded by some as a serious charge to make, but I hope that I shall continue to tread in his footsteps when they leave a print which is so plainly visible. We need to recognise in these new countries, at any rate, that there is one law for nations just as there is for individuals—that the guarantee of individual well-being, of individual security, and individual welfare, consists in the observance of the law of self-sacrifice; nations, as well as individuals, must subscribe to that law. Therefore, we want to so arrange our Statutes as to make it possible for us to exercise the utmost possible self-restraint in our dealings with our own race and kin, so that we may build up a united and consolidated Empire. Upon the present occasion there need be no trouble in accomplishing the object at which we aim. The honorable member for Bland is quite willing that the requisite alterations in the law should be made. So is the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, who has stated in a nutshell all that I can say now.

In an interview which recently appeared in the press, he said that—

He had no personal objections to an amending Act confining its operation to instances where it was intended to meet the cases of men brought here during a strike to take the places of other workers. In some instances—and here is my reply to the statement of the honorable member for Bourke—

In some instances, the Department has administered the Act foolishly, and against the intentions of the framers of the measure.

That is all I wish to say in criticism of the administration of the Act by the Government. I appeal to the Prime Minister to make a clear and definite statement to Australia as to whether the Government will repeal or amend the section to which I have referred, and by "repealing" it, I mean so amending it as to substitute a provision upon the lines I have indicated. If he proposes to do that, I trust that he will let us know the intentions of the Government at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—In order that I may not outrun the time allotted to me without omitting essentials, it will be necessary for me to concentrate the remarks which I have to make, so that I trust honorable members will supply for themselves the necessary development of anything I may say. For a moment, I am compelled to hark back to the circumstances under which the Immigration Restriction Act was passed, and to the purposes for which it was enacted. It was one of the first and strongest steps towards the establishment of a White Australia, the common ambition of all parties, and of all persons in the Commonwealth. In order to insure the maintenance of a White Australia, a Bill was submitted for the purpose of enabling us to restrict immigration, the intention being chiefly—I think I may say wholly—to exclude immigration which would not make Australia more white, or leave it as white as it was. In the course of the consideration of that measure, an amendment was introduced for quite another purpose—an industrial purpose—in order to prevent the standard of living in Australia being unduly, or suddenly, or improperly lowered by the influx, even of people with a white skin. So far as I can remember, almost the only objection taken to that proposal at the time, arose from the fact that it was sought to be introduced into a Bill which had been drafted for another purpose, and that this was, however defensible it might be on other grounds, an inconvenient place to insert it. That was my own view, and experience has justified it. To that circumstance a good deal of misconception in respect of the Australian attitude towards immigration is undoubtedly due. But that was only one cause of misconstruction. The other cause lay in the fact that we found ourselves unable to put in plain English, upon the face of this Statute, what its direct purpose was. Our obligations to the mother country, to the relations which she had formed with other peoples, together with the very natural and proper desire not to appear to reflect upon other races merely because of a difference in colour—all these considerations moved us to make a fight in order that we should not be compelled to place upon the statute-book a prohibition for colour alone. When my honorable friend, the deputy-leader of the Opposition, speaks of the loyalty which we feel, and ought to feel in matters of this kind, which have an international significance, let me remind him that it was members upon this side of the House who loyally sacrificed their own personal wishes in order to place upon the statute-book an Immigration Restriction Act which should not contain the objectionable prohibition in regard to colour. From the first, this Act was loaded down by two causes of misconception abroad, one because we were unable to state in so many words what its original purpose was, and the other because an industrial proposal—excellent in its way—was sandwiched into a Bill of quite another character. The education test and the contract labour clause, together, misled critics at Home, especially when they were continually misrepresented here. I had experience of this in 1902 and 1903, and when I returned to office this year, did not wait for any impulse from outside, but decided, with my colleagues, that the time had come when we needed to review parts of this measure. The speech of the honorable member for Parramatta has related chiefly to section 3 of the Act. He confined himself to the discussion of sub-section g, which relates to the admission of immigrants under contract. Apart from that, I had become aware that it is not only that sub-section which requires reconsideration, but other portions of the same section, and other sections, partly because, in the actual work of administration, obscurities have been discovered and inconveniences found, and partly because there are some large questions of policy which require to be taken into account. These, however, I do not propose to allude to this morning, because the honorable member for Parramatta has concentrated his criticism upon one sub-section. I pass them by, merely saying, in passing, that it appears to me that this question of Immigration Restriction can only be reasonably and fully considered in relation to the larger question of which it forms a part, and that is how to obtain desirable immigrants. Those who accept the doctrine of a White Australia, as I have often said, must repudiate the suggestion that it means an empty Australia. It is impossible for Australia to be made or kept white except by means of a white people planted wherever white men can live and work with profit. We believe that is possible in most parts of the Continent—every one believes that it relates to all but a fraction of it—and this Government intends to exhaust every means of extending and multiplying white settlement. By that means only can Australia be kept white. By that means only, as the honorable member for Parramatta has said, can it be made safe from the aggression of those to exclude whom the Immigration Restriction Act was primarily passed. It was passed to restrict anything that would prevent our obtaining a white Australia, and it has to be reconsidered in the light of the great purpose that this exclusion implies—the purpose of obtaining a sufficient immigration to this country to make Australia white to-day and for all time. Honorable members will recognise that the most familiar, and very often the most desirable, class of immigration is that which is drawn thither by the attractions of the country, and comes absolutely free. The whole of the immigration to America is of that class, because immigrants under contract are forbidden. Even if they were not prohibited, however, it would still be the fact that 95 per cent., and perhaps more, of the immigration that would be sought for, and would come, would be free. When my honorable friend said in his earlier remarks that we were imposing a restriction upon free immigrants, I thought that he would explain his meaning, but probably the short time at his disposal prevented his doing so. The Immigration Restriction Act imposes no restriction upon white people, who are free to make their choice of a new country, and free to enter any occupation when they come to it. I premise that in order to avoid misunderstanding.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member had better do so.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Men who come out under engagement are not bondsmen.

Mr. DEAKIN.—They are under bond to work for a certain time, and for certain rates of pay.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—So is every man.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not going to object to phrases. I wish, in the first instance, to premise this in order to give due proportion to other conditions. If, in speaking of immigration, and the restriction of immigration, we confined our consideration to paragraph g of section 3, we should fall into the misapprehension that might be formed by those who read the speech delivered by the honorable member for Parramatta, that the only immigration we expect, or can get, is immigration under contract. That is, of course, wholly erroneous. I agree that Australia's need of population is so great that we ought not to obstruct contract labour any more than free labour, if we can avoid doing so. In other words, paragraph g requires reconsideration. As a matter of fact, it has been under consideration by the Government. I was dealing with the whole question before I had been a month in office, and before it had been mentioned in the House or outside. I entered into a correspondence with the Premiers of the States, which afterwards developed into a special correspondence with the Premier of New South Wales, which involved the reconsideration of this clause. If time permits, the House will be given an opportunity to amend it in a measure that I hope to submit before the prorogation. That, however, will depend on the completeness of our information on certain points relating not merely to matters of administration—with some of which I am already dealing—but to other questions respecting which I am awaiting advices from those who are better informed than myself. When honorable members carefully look at paragraph g, which deals with only a small part of the immigration we are likely to get, and consider the general comments that have been made upon it, they will find—as the Government have found—that its amendment is not so simple as it appears on the surface. When it was originally proposed, it was defended because it was thought undesirable that men employed in Australia should be displaced during industrial disputes by the importation of labour from abroad. That was willingly agreed to. But have honorable members yet considered how they would frame a new clause dealing with the matter, when we already have in operation in New South Wales and Western Australia, Acts whose purpose is to abolish the very strikes which it was originally intended should occasion the exercise of this prohibition.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—They have not been effectual.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not prepared to admit that. The honorable and learned member is right that the first application of a new law to new circumstances cannot operate with the precision which I trust will yet be secured; but at all events under these laws strikes are prohibited.

Mr. LONSDALE.—They are not.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member is technically right; but I am speaking in a general sense, and am sure the House understands me. We must not overlook the existence of laws dealing with industrial disputes, and designed to prevent strikes. Their existence means the re-shaping of the contract section of the Immigration Restriction Act in a different fashion from that which would have sufficed before we had such laws in force, especially as they exist in some of the States and not in others, and operate under different conditions. Although I have given some attention to the drafting of the necessary amendment of paragraph g, there is this preliminary difficulty which the professional members of the House will recognise as possessing a certain complexity. Then, again, it is said that the objection is to the introduction of men under contract to work for less than the ruling rate of wages. We have to recollect that there is no one ruling Australian rate of wages in respect to any class of skilled or unskilled labour. Take the wages in parts of Western Australia, Victoria, New South Wales, and Queensland, and you will find that they are governed largely by the cost of living, the climatic conditions which prevail, and other circumstances. Any provision which aims at carrying out the reasonable intention of the House to prevent the introduction of underpaid labour will require careful consideration. The drafting of an amendment to give effect to this desire without discriminating between States will prove a more difficult task than is imagined by those who may not have fully considered the matter. The next point relates simply to the matter of deception, and there no difficulty need be expected. I conclude by saying that it is not a simple matter, even for the Parliamentary draftsman to deal with paragraph g, from the Australian stand-point, and having regard to Australian labour legislation. Time will not permit of my alluding to certain incidents of the past, which I hope are thoroughly understood here. The honorable member who preceded me referred to the incident of the six hatters, and very properly, in the first instance, put the blame where it rested. The employer who made the agreement in question did not give any intimation to the Commonwealth authorities before, or even after, he had made it. He allowed us accidentally to discover the men on a steamer, and about to land under unknown obligations. This called for immediate action. The Minister had no knowledge of the circumstances of the trade, the wages paid, or anything else. That compelled an intervention which should not have been forced upon us by a citizen who was acquainted with the law he had to obey. It was the unfortunate delay in dealing with the men, that arose out of his want of notice, that gave rise to the whole of the misconception associated with that case.

Mr. SPEAKER. — The time allotted under the Standing Orders to the honorable and learned member has expired. Is it his desire to continue?

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it the pleasure of the House that the honorable and learned gentleman have leave to continue?

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am obliged to honorable members, but shall occupy their attention for only a few minutes, as I do not wish to trespass upon the time at their disposal. The case of the groom was that he came to Australia to deliver horses. My honorable friend insists that this means that he came here under contract to perform manual labour. If it were examined with the "double-million magnifying glass" of which Sam Weller speaks, such a contention might be admitted. But it would be unreasonable—foreign, not only to the intention of the House when passing the measure, but to the purpose of the Act itself. Proof that I held this view may be found in the fact that before I knew the groom had left England—before attention had been or could have been called to the case, as he had not arrived in Australia—I found the papers among the first submitted to me on taking office, and at once expressed the opinion that his coming to Australia would not be the entrance of a person into the Commonwealth to perform manual labour under contract within the meaning of paragraph g. I wrote to that effect to the Agent-General for New South Wales before the matter had reached the public ear. So far as I knew, it would never become public. I understood that there would be time for my reply to reach the Agent-General before the groom left England, and informed him that he had no need to issue an exemption certificate.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable and learned gentleman really say that it was not a contract to perform manual labour?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Not in the circumstances. De minimis non curat lex. The mere fact that one groom came out in those circumstances could not be said to constitute a breach of the section. The honorable member urged me to take a commonsense view of this law, and to carefully consider its purpose. I did so when, without a moment's hesitation, I said that the coming of this groom to Australia did not bring him within the scope of the Act. All the Agents-General were informed some time ago that they could issue certificates of exemption to persons who came within the definition of "prohibited immigrants" under the Act.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That was done by the Reid-McLean Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It was long before the Reid-McLean Government came into office.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It was only notified in the press when that Administration was in office.

Mr. WATSON.—Sir Horace Tozer and his servant came out before then.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The instruction was given long before the late Government took office, and the exemptions were intended to apply only to persons of colour. When Sir Horace Tozer wrote to the Barton Government—and this proves the correctness of my statement as to the date when the instruction as to exemption certificates was first given—he was informed by Sir Edmund Barton, who was then Minister of External Affairs, that the grant to the Agents-General of the power to issue certificates of exemption was intended to apply only to persons who, on account of their race, would be liable to be made prohibited immigrants under the Act. The Agents-General were never given authority to issue certificates of exemption to persons coming here under contract, and never asked for it. As soon as I learned that they were doing so, they were informed that it was unnecessary.

Mr. WATSON.—Mr. Coghlan was not in London when that instruction was sent, so that he is to be excused.

Mr. DEAKIN.—When I said that Mr. Coghlan had made a mistake, I did not intend in the least degree to reflect upon him. He had then taken office for the first time, and was either misinformed by those under him or by his brother Agents-General. But when the honorable and learned member for Wannon put the broad question whether persons coming out under contract needed certificates of exemption, I said that they did under the law. I said that they should forward their contracts beforehand to the Department, in order that they might be examined; otherwise, if they came out and asked for a certificate of exemption, they would obtain one at any time if it was justified. I do not wish to detain the House further, but trust that I have clearly indicated the intentions of the Government. We are now reconsidering the Act in the light of the experience gained by its administration, especially with regard to paragraph g, and the questions of policy to which I have generally alluded. But we are scanning it mainly with a view to the encouragement of the desirable immigrants we require to make and keep Australia white. The offer received yesterday from General Booth, the head of the Salvation Army, to send here 5,000 reputable families, whose characters are without blemish, and who are not paupers or destitute—which will be about the average number available among those who will find the hardships of the coming winter in Great Britain too bitter—provides a touchstone for ascertaining the opinion of this country on the subject of immigration. The Immigration Restriction Act does not prohibit the introduction of such people. It is not intended that they shall be sent out under contract. They are British subjects, and will be welcome. But what will bring them, and the temptation without which others cannot be got to come, is something which it is not within the Federal power to offer—the opportunity to get land on which to make homes. It is the land laws of Australia that are the real obstacles to immigration. Why is the population of Victoria declining? Because the sons of our farmers have to hive off to Queensland to find homes there, although they have the first right to call on us to make provision for their future. Why do people drift to Canada and America instead of coming to Australia, if it is not because of our comparatively complicated and out-of-date land laws? It is the land question that provides the key to the immigration question. Queensland and Western Australia are making provision first for their own people, and then for people from abroad. They do well, but if other States are losing men, it is because their land laws have remained practically unamended, some of them for a quarter of a century. In the older States one hears of farmers who are starved out before they can put their families upon the land. If any State continues to lose population, it is because it does not give sufficient encouragement for settlement. I do not pretend that when the States have amended their land laws all that is necessary will have been done. All of them are large enough to carry many hundreds of suitable settlers. When the land has been made freely available, the Commonwealth must provide employment to keep our people occupied. When Australia provides free land for the people, and protection for all producers, we shall have solved the population question. Only reasonable restrictions will be necessary to prevent the immigration of the unsifted ne'er-do-wells of other countries, against the introduction of whom both Canada and the United States have legislated. The derelicts even of Europe would not add to the health, wealth, or strength of our community. Our population should be multiplied as fast as possible, according to our ability to assimilate desirable immigrants. Only by amending the land laws of the States and by giving protection to enable our raw products to be manufactured into the goods necessary for the use of our people, can we solve this problem. The magnitude of the subject, and its vital importance to Australia, must justify me for having trespassed so long on the time of the House.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH (Parkes).—The heroic tone adopted by the Prime Minister is about as transparent a piece of affectation as I have ever heard in this Chamber.

One would think that he has for years past been clamouring for some great right, or endeavouring to vindicate some great claim, and that now, at length, he has realized his desires. With every wish not to stir up unpleasantness, I am bound to say that I think he is one of the arch-conspirators in regard to the abuses of the Immigration Restriction Act which we have had. He has been in office, and has held the reins of power, for almost four out of the five years during which the States have been federated, without moving a hand to mitigate the abuses which have now become so tremendous that even those who helped him to bring them about are forced to confess the blunder which they have made. The position of this country, as made plain to the whole world, is a humiliating one. I do not desire to claim credit for having predicted this result when I spoke in 1901, but it seems to me an extraordinary instance of the irony of fate that the honorable and learned member who now almost aggressively asseverates the need of Australia for a white population, during his four years of office failed even to attempt to mitigate the Act. When the measure was before this House, and the honorable member for North Sydney wished to substitute the word "prescribed" for the word "dictated," I pointed out to the Prime Minister of the day, Sir Edmund Barton, that the effect of the wording proposed by the Government would be that a European coming to this country could be required to pass an examination in a language other than his own. I pointed out to him that the clause as framed would enable the Executive of the day to require a Frenchman to pass an examination in Russian, and his reply was, "No Ministry would dare to do such a thing."

Mr. DEAKIN.—And no Ministry has asked a Frenchman to pass an examination in Russian.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH. — Is the Prime Minister going to quibble in that way? Did we not have a case in which a German—

Mr. WATSON.—A convicted thief, and a coloured man.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—He was not excluded on those grounds. He offered to pass an examination in three languages.

Mr. CULPIN.—What was his nationality?

Mr. WATSON.—He was an outcast and a thief, but apparently, in the opinion of the honorable and learned member for Parkes, a desirable immigrant.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—He was a German, and offered to pass an examination in German, French, or English; but under the Act, of which I feel ashamed, he was asked to pass an examination in Greek. Then a Portuguese sailor—

Mr. DEAKIN.—A Cape Verde Islander, also a coloured man.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—A Portuguese sailor landed at Newcastle, and was prepared to pass an examination in his own language, but instead of being allowed to do so he was examined in English, and on failing to pass was sentenced to six months' hard labour.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Did any one ever pretend that a knowledge of languages was what was sought in these cases?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The honorable and learned gentleman has heard of this case on two former occasions, but the only reply he could make was that the man was a Cape Verde Islander, and not a Portuguese. I have already pointed out to him that the Cape Verde Islands are a dependency of Portugal, and that the people of those islands are of the Portuguese race. The fact which I wish to again place before the House, and of which the country should be ashamed, is that this Portuguese colonist was not allowed to enter Australia, as he could not pass an examination in a language other than his own. But I will pass away from the application of the law to European immigrants to the manner in which it has been administered in regard to the admission of persons of our own race. That is sufficiently exemplified by the attitude which the Prime Minister has adopted towards the British immigrants proposed to be introduced by General Booth. That gentleman has had to come from England to consult the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth and the Premiers of the States to ascertain if he could bring English families into what are English Colonies. Now we find that the Prime Minister did not settle the question during his interview with General Booth. He has within the last two or three days received a communication from General Booth on the subject; but, instead of sending back a cablegram saying that we should welcome these people, because they are our countrymen—a course which Australia would have hailed with satisfaction—he enters into communication with the Governments of the States to learn if we can accommodate them.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Because the Commonwealth Government has no control over the public lands of Australia.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The Prime Minister very much overrates the difficulties of the situation. When at the end of his somewhat lengthy speech, he said that he hoped that he had made clear to the House what he intends to do, I was forced to admit to myself, although I had listened, as the Americans say, with my ears buttoned back, that I did not know what his intention is. If those who sit here and patiently and carefully listen to what the honorable and learned member says, cannot clearly understand his intentions, or the nature of the amendment of the law which he proposes, the people outside will not understand his attitude. The difficulties from both the legislative and legal point of view have been very much exaggerated. Honorable members may have forgotten the exact wording of the Immigration Restriction Act. Honorable members who look at the Act will see that the section has a number of sub-heads, defining prohibited immigrants. There is also a provision which reads as follows:—

But the following are excepted—

- (h) any person possessed of a certificate of exemption in force, for the time being, in the form in the schedule signed by the Minister, or by any officer appointed under this Act, whether within or without the Commonwealth.

Then at the end of the Act the form of certificate is given as follows:—

This is to certify that _____ of _____ aged _____ years, a [insert trade, calling, or other description], is exempted for a period of _____ from the date hereof, from the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act 1901.

It will be seen that under this certificate it will be competent for the Minister, or any one here or abroad authorized by him, to issue a certificate for 999 years. The Prime Minister has exaggerated unnecessarily the alterations of the law required with regard to British immigrants. The Act contains a category of the different kinds of prohibited immigrants, and then there is an addendum by which all the restrictive provisions may be overcome by the Minister, or some one authorized by him, issuing a certificate of exemption at any time, under any circumstances, and for whatever period he chooses. There is nothing in the Act to show, as the Prime Minister has stated, that it was intended to apply to coloured persons only. It applies to everybody, but it would be possible under the Act to authorize the High Commissioner for the Commonwealth, or the Agents-General of the States, or any stranger, to issue certificates which would permit any persons to come to Australia. We do not want to introduce feeling into a discussion of this kind, and I object very much to indulgence in heroics, particularly on the part of the man who has done all the harm. It is very satisfactory to think that, after four years' experience, Australia has begun to see that her somewhat hysterical policy is likely to prove so injurious that an entire change is necessary. Instead of prohibiting people from coming here, it is now considered necessary to offer them inducements to come. I think there is a general feeling among honorable members that it is not desirable to hark back and say who was right or who was wrong; and we certainly do not want any forensic tricks in this House. We do not want the man who has been doing wrong for four years to come forward and assume the part of one who has been injured, and by inference condemn others who are in no way responsible for the trouble which has been brought about.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—By way of personal explanation, let me say that I was a private member of Parliament at the time of General Booth's visit to Australia. I had the pleasure of meeting him several times, and am in a position to say that his visit to Australia had no reference to Commonwealth legislation. He came here to obtain land for the people whom he desired to introduce, and he saw the States Premiers with reference to that matter.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The Minister did not show him how he could introduce his people here.

Mr. DEAKIN.—There was no need, because they could, and can, come in without any question. When General Booth cabled to me yesterday I, with a full knowledge of his wishes, sent on the message to those who have the control of the land required, namely, the Premiers of the States. The message had nothing whatever to do with the Commonwealth Restriction Act in any way.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—It seems to me that, in view of the statements we have so frequently heard in this House and in other parts of the Commonwealth, it is necessary to look into this question. It is a curious fact, as has been noted recently by Mr. Coghlan, that we in Australia seem to suffer from a form of political disease that is absent in practically every other British community. Whilst Canada has stringent laws in operation as to the admission of immigrants, and enforces them with a severity that has never been attempted in Australia—

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—£1 per head is being paid for immigrants.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member knows perfectly well that that has no reference to immigrants under contract. His statement is only on a par with his usual misrepresentations. Whilst the exclusion laws in Canada are administered with a severity that has never been imitated here, not one word of calumny has been circulated in England, because the people of the Dominion, while they may have their differences with regard to political issues, are united in their efforts to put the best side of Canadian politics and actions before the world. Here, on the other hand, there seems to have been a concerted movement on the part of honorable members in Opposition, and their press supporters outside, to misrepresent every action of the Federal Parliament or of the Federal administrators. This has been done purely for party purposes, and has unfortunately created in the motherland an utterly wrong impression regarding Australia.

Mr. BAMFORD.—If there had not been any Labour members in this House we should not have heard anything about it.

Mr. WATSON.—As it happens, an immigration restriction law would have been passed even if there had been no Labour Party in Federal politics. No objection to the Bill was raised by any section of the House.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—On the ground that we should trust the Minister.

Mr. WATSON.—Speaking generally, the administration of the Act has not been bad. In regard to the case of the six hatters, the right honorable member for East Sydney recently repeated the ridiculous assertion of Dr. Fitchett, who has done his utmost to vilify Australian legislation, to the effect that each of these six hatters had cost the Commonwealth £1,000,000. A more ridiculous statement it would be difficult to conceive. With regard to the case of the six hatters, the blame rested solely on the shoulders of Mr. Anderson, the manufacturer who was responsible for their introduction to Australia. As soon as Mr. Anderson adopted the course prescribed by law, and the administrator of the Act had an opportunity to investigate the contract under which it was sought to introduce the men, the hatters were allowed to land. Surely no one here proposes to allow people to come into Australia under contract without reserving to some responsible person, on behalf of the Commonwealth, the right to investigate the terms and conditions of their contract. I am sure that such a proposal would not meet with the approval of this House, or of the people of Australia. Mr. Anderson, by refraining from making an application as required by the Act, would have prevented the Minister from even going the length of inquiring as to the terms and conditions under which the men were being introduced.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My contention is that the Minister might have avoided all the trouble.

Mr. WATSON.—I have no doubt that the honorable member, when he takes his seat upon the Treasury benches, will prove to be a Heaven-sent administrator. Personally, I do not see that anything else could have been done. Mr. Anderson, although he was made fully acquainted with the requirements of the law, refused to make any application until a week had elapsed; and I do not see how the Minister could have allowed the men to land whilst the employer declined to comply with the law.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member knows very well that Mr. Anderson got his back up when he found that the men were blocked.

Mr. WATSON.—He ought to have adopted the course which was prescribed by the law, and fully explained to him at an early stage of the trouble. He thus had an opportunity to correct a pardonable error by applying to the Minister for permission to land the men. The misrepresentation and vilification of the Commonwealth has been going on for the last three or four years. Men in responsible positions have deliberately, or at any rate, with every appearance of deliberation, misrepresented the actual facts. Only the other day, the honorable member for Oxley stated unblushingly that he had written to a certain man in Wales—a Welshman—stating that if he came to Australia he would be subjected to an examination, probably in some language other than his own. Surely there is nothing in the Act to justify—to put it at its best—ignorance of that character. We cannot wonder that people outside of Australia misunderstand the object of our legislation, when a gentleman who has been a member of this Parliament from its inception, and who voted in favour of the Bill, makes a statement of that character, with the chance that it will be published broadcast over the authoritative name of a member of this Parliament. Then we have the honorable and learned member for Parkes, who says that he takes no credit for the change of attitude that has been brought about. I think he speaks with too much modesty, because he has persistently vilified and misrepresented the actions of the Administration.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Every one is a vilifier who differs from the honorable member.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member will not contend that Mr. Coghlan had any political purpose to serve when he directed attention to the absolute vilification and misrepresentation of Australia that had been going on. We had an instance to-day, in the reference to General Booth which was made by the honorable and learned member for Parkes, of the insidious misrepresentation which has been going on in this connexion for years past. Surely the honorable and learned member knows well the conditions under which General Booth came to Australia. He came primarily to attend to the affairs of his religious organization. We all know what he said when he was here recently. He came to Australia primarily to attend to the affairs of the Salvation Army, and incidentally he desired to know whether land could be obtained for respectable families whom he might be able to send here. Nobody knows better than a constitutional student like the honorable and learned member for Parkes, that the question of affording facilities to people to get upon the land has nothing whatever to do with the Commonwealth Government or with the Immigration Restriction Act. Yet he declared that the fact that General Booth had to come to Australia to consult the Prime Minister before he could introduce British subjects into a British possession, was proof of the effect of our legislation. I say that his statement constitutes a most damnable misrepresentation, and if the honorable and learned member did not intend that it should be repeated outside as evidence of what the Act compels, he should at once withdraw it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Unfortunately, we have no record of the conversations which took place between the Prime Minister and General Booth.

Mr. WATSON.—That is a very lame excuse. The honorable and learned member knows well that there is not one section in the Commonwealth law which would prevent a family sent out by General Booth from taking up any land in Australia with which the States Governments might be able to supply them.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—If they were under contract they would be denied admission.

Mr. WATSON.—Surely the honorable and learned member knows that General Booth made no suggestion as to sending men out under contract. His whole scheme was intended to assist people of good character to make homes for themselves in a new land, and was not designed to make a profit out of them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Suppose that some of these men were to bring employés with them under contract.

Mr. DEAKIN.—General Booth never raised such a point.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member for Parramatta makes valiant efforts to come to the assistance of his newly-found lieutenant.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am pointing out some of the considerations that the honorable member skips all the time.

Mr. WATSON.—The consideration suggested by the honorable member is one which, for the sake of his intelligence, he might skip with advantage. I say that the remarks of the honorable and learned member for Parkes are only an example of what Australia has suffered from for years past in connexion with this kind of legislation. For mere party purposes, a number of gentlemen, both inside and outside of this Parliament, have indulged in absolute misrepresentation as to the intention and effect of our legislation. I have a greater regard for what I believe to be the interests of Australia than I have for any mere appearance of political consistency on my part, and consequently I am prepared to join with all sections of the House in an effort to make the terms of the Immigration Restriction Act so clear that he who runs may read, and in order that there may be no further excuse for misrepresentation or misunderstanding.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The meaning of its provisions is already clear enough. The honorable member would like to go back upon some of his previous actions.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That remark is not a generous one.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It is quite as generous as is the speech of the honorable member for Bland.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not expect generosity in this connexion. A little wholesome truth is not altogether astray in a matter of this sort.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not if it is truth.

Mr. SPEAKER. — I have already pointed out this morning that it is distinctly unfair for honorable members by interjection to take up the time of the honorable member who is in possession of the Chair, and I am sure that no honorable member wishes to be unfair. I do hope, therefore, that these interjections will cease.

Mr. WATSON.—It has been insinuated that my statements are not justified by any misrepresentation which has been indulged in. I contend that the continued references to Stelling—a half-caste and a convicted thief, who attempted to enter the Commonwealth—as an instance of a European who was subjected to a test in a language other than his own, are distinctly misrepresentations. The man was an undesirable immigrant, who had been convicted of the paltriest and meanest kind of theft. There is no backing down on my part so far as any essential in the contract provision of the Immigration Restriction Act is concerned. When I submitted it in 1902, I stated that its object was to insure that we should not subject our own people to the competition of those who came to Australia bound and shackled, or to the competition of those from abroad who have been utterly deceived as to the conditions obtaining here.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Under the Act a contract would not be binding under those circumstances. It would be made void by another section.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member should know from his experience of industrial matters that it is not a good thing to have a number of destitute men suddenly dumped down at a port in Australia, even though the contracts into which they originally entered have been rendered void. It is not sufficient to nullify a contract, and to leave men stranded, and at the mercy of those with whom they had originally entered into an agreement. In view of the urgent need that there is in Australia for immigration, and the fact that the satisfaction of that need depends in my opinion—as in that of the Prime Minister—upon land being made available for settlement by the various States Governments, I have been impressed with the degree to which these slanders have permeated the press of Great Britain. Within the last year I have taken up newspaper after newspaper, in which I have found the statement repeated under big headings, with a view to showing the exclusive policy upon which Australia is said to have entered.

Mr. HUME COOK.—They were Conservative newspapers.

Mr. WATSON.—Not all of them. I am speaking of journals which have been honestly misled as to the condition of affairs existing here. In view of these facts, I am quite prepared to assist in putting the law upon such a footing that there can be no excuse for anybody not understanding our aims, and how far we desire to encourage people to come here.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—The honorable member for Bland has taken the extraordinary course of complaining about vilification, and yet has himself become a vilifier. He charged members of the Opposition with having engaged in a crusade for the vilification of Australia, and declared that they were responsible for the criticisms, whether fair or unfair—and some of them, I admit, are unfair—which have appeared in the British press concerning our conditions and the administration of our laws.

Mr. WATSON.—I certainly made that charge in respect of some members of the Opposition.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I say that the honorable member's statement is absolutely inaccurate.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have already twice called attention to the fact that honorable members by interjection are taking up the time allotted to the honorable member who is addressing the House. As honorable members have not yet recognised my request that fair play should be extended to the various speakers. I shall be obliged to take stronger action if interjections are persisted in.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I repeat that the statement of the honorable member for Bland is absolutely inaccurate, and I would use a stronger word in regard to it if the rules of Parliament allowed me to do so. In the very vague and uncertain statement which the Prime Minister made in reply to the deputy leader of the Opposition, he only indicated definitely that he intended to improve the condition of the British people—so far as Australia was concerned—by adding to the exclusion of British citizens, the exclusion of British goods by means of an increased measure of protection. In this connexion I would ask the honorable member for Bland to recollect the circumstances under which the Immigration Restriction Act was passed. He knows that it was an Act under which we had to trust the Administration, when we gave them power to examine in any language they chose, not merely coloured immigrants, but white immigrants.

Mr. DEAKIN.—We have never yet examined a white man.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am not saying that the Government have done so. Under the Act we have to repose absolute trust in the Administration. We conferred upon the Government of the day the power to which I have alluded, and if it be properly exercised the aim of Parliament will be attained. If, on the contrary, advantage were taken of that power to subject British immigrants to an examination in a language of which they knew nothing, it would be an undoubted straining of the intention of Parliament, and would very properly call for animadversion, both from members of this House, and from the people and press of Great Britain. It was the honorable member for Bland who proposed the amendment to which our attention has been especially directed to-day. He gave us the assurance that it was intended to be used only to prohibit the introduction of labour in quantity when industrial disputes were in progress, and to prevent contracts being made in ignorance of the conditions obtaining in Australia, and the signatures to which might have been secured by actual deception. Upon those representations he secured the support of a large majority of the House. There was no serious discussion of the proposal, and it was understood that the provisions of the section would be enforced only under the conditions to which I have referred. But we have seen for some time—and I am glad that honorable members are beginning to recognise it—that the effect of the law is that, even in connexion with the engagement of one man for a special purpose, and for a short period, applications have to be made for an exemption certificate. The people of Great Britain have come to the conclusion that so many dangers beset those who would come to Australia under engagement that it is better not to come at all than to incur the liabilities attaching to immigration under our laws. The Prime Minister stated that the contract laws were rigidly enforced in the United States of America. That is doubtless the case, but they are not enforced against American citizens. America has never enforced, and has never proposed to enforce, a contract law against its own citizens, or those of its dependencies. Such persons may enter the United States of America, even under contract, without any interference on the part of the law. And yet Australia—a British community—is enforcing the contract provisions in this Act against Britishers, even in circumstances in which it was said when the Bill was before us that there would be no necessity to do so. To describe men who come here under contract as undesirable immigrants or bondsmen is to make the most improper use of those terms.

Mr. WATSON.—It depends on the circumstances.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am referring to cases in which men come here under contract to receive the ordinary rates of wages—men who, when entering into that contract, knew what they were doing—and are not imported to interfere in industrial disputes. Surely some of the best men obtainable from Great Britain are those who would come out only under engagement—men who are able to command constant employment in Great Britain. Surely they would be a desirable class to have in Australia. They naturally say, "We can obtain work in Great Britain, and why should we come to Australia unless employment is assured to us?" It is undesirable that men should arrive in Australia in destitute circumstances, but some honorable members lose sight of the fact that a man who has scraped up every shilling to pay for his passage to Australia, and whose chances of employment on arrival here depend solely on the condition of the labour market, runs a risk of becoming destitute. I am not saying for one moment that the honorable member for Bland, or those who agree with him, are backing down from the position they originally took up.

Mr. WATSON.—On the honorable member's own statement I am not.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am not going to pursue the tactics of the honorable member, who this morning delivered a speech that was not in his usual style. I shall not attribute wrong motives to him, or say that he is abandoning his principles. I am simply pointing out that he has seen fit to form a different view of the effect of the contract labour section from that which he first took. I am pleased that he and the Prime Minister now see their way to reconsider it. I recognise that there are some difficulties in the way of amending the provision in question, but those difficulties are not insuperable. If we know what we want, surely it should not be impossible for us to express that desire in an amendment of the section. I hope that the Prime Minister will not delay dealing with the matter, but will recognise that, even though the drafting of an amendment to the section may involve some difficulty, there are still greater difficulties and objections in the retention of the section as it stands. I do not recognise one difficulty which the Prime Minister suggests. He says that the creation of the Arbitration Courts in several of the States has given rise to new difficulties in the way of amending this provision. To my mind they have simply eased the situation. If an industrial dispute were brought before an Arbitration Court the wages and hours of labour to be observed in the trade in question would be determined, and the rates and hours fixed by the Court would be regarded as those which were to rule in the industry. A new arrival would consequently have to comply with that decision.

Mr. DEAKIN.—That is not my difficulty.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Then I do not know what difficulty the honorable and learned gentleman has in mind. Our experience of late years shows that there is so little danger to be expected from this source that the section might be wholly repealed. If the case put forward by the honorable member for Bland—that there should be no interference with industrial disputes by the importation of cheap labour, and that there should be no misconception as to the rates of wages and conditions of labour in Australia on the part of those entering into a contract to labour here—needs consideration, it can be met. The sooner we remove from the minds of the people of Great Britain the impression which has been supported by incidents that have actually occurred—the impression that we wish to restrict the immigration of men seeking honest employment—the better. The sooner we remove the impression that a community of British people, which is indebted to Great Britain for the great gift of the Continent of Australia, and many of the liberties it enjoys, places restrictions in the way of honest citizens of the Empire coming to Australia to accept honest employment, and not with the intention of forcing down wages, or of interfering with an industrial dispute, the better for the Commonwealth. In some cases the coming of these men to Australia may lead to the creation of new industries, and it is most undesirable that their admission to the Continent should be restricted, or that they should be subjected to any humiliation at our hands. The sooner we so amend our law as to clearly show the people of Great Britain what we intend and what we do not intend, the better for Australia. As there seems to be a consensus of opinion that an amendment of the Act is necessary, I hope that action in that direction will be taken by the Government at as early a date as possible. Before the Ministerial announcement was made, it was my intention to test the opinion of the House on the question; but I willingly give way to the Government, as I recognise that its assistance is probably necessary in connexion with such an amendment of our law. I trust that at an early date we shall see the worst features of section 3 of the Immigration Restriction Act removed from our statute-book, and a different opinion created throughout the British Empire from that which at present exists in regard to our immigration laws.

Mr. MALONEY (Melbourne).—No truer words ever fell from the lips of a Minister than those which were uttered by the Prime Minister as to the reason for Victoria's loss of population. Thirty years ago I endeavoured to settle on the land, but the difficulties which beset me were such that the area I obtained has up to the present been nothing but a burden to me. The honorable member for North Sydney inquired whether the United States of America ever applied the contract labour laws against one of its own citizens. I would inform him that, if a citizen of the United States left England under contract to work in the States, he would not be allowed to land unless he was able to answer a very severe set of questions that would be put to him. That is the information which I obtained first hand at Manila. I was informed that men from Hongkong have been refused permission to land in America. An immigrant is questioned even as to his opinions on the marriage question before he is permitted to land. The honorable member for Bland spoke of the stringent immigration regulations which prevailed in the United States, and the honorable member for North Sydney, on inquiry at the office of the Consul for the United States, will learn for himself how severe they are. I am in a position to show that a Crown Colony of Great Britain has a law directed really against its own citizens. I have endeavoured to obtain an original document relating to this matter, and if it be forthcoming from the office of the Minister of External Affairs, I hope that I shall have permission to print it. No Australian regulation is so stringent as the one in operation in the Crown Colony of Hongkong. It was issued while I was there. Under it if an Englishman, Irishman, Scotchman, Australian, German, or Russian took ship at Macao, one and a half hour's sail, from Hongkong—or even from a nearer port—and became destitute on landing at Hongkong, the agents or owners of the ship would be answerable for any cost incurred by the Government in respect of the man. Further than that, the Government may require the ship-owners to return all such individuals to their place of birth.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH. — That is the law practically all over the world.

Mr. MALONEY.—That is an absurd statement for the honorable and learned member to make. I was informed that the captain and owners of every vessel entering the English port of Hongkong were answerable for any man who left that ship and had to earn his living. Compared with such a regulation, those in force in the Commonwealth are trifling. The sooner Australia awakens to a knowledge of the party that slanders and degrades the country which feeds and clothes its members, the better. I have no doubt that it is the desire of every honorable member that we should have a happy and a prosperous people, and I am astonished that some honorable members of the Opposition, who possess liberal and democratic tendencies, should be led into paths which I am sure their conscience must bid them to avoid. The majority of the newspapers supporting the Opposition are those guilty of vilifying Australia.

Debate interrupted. Orders of the Day called on under standing order 119.

COMMERCE BILL (No. 2).

Debate resumed from 14th September (vide page 2344), on motion by Mr. KNOX—

That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of the following members:—Sir W. J. Lyne, Mr. Lee, Mr. Brown, Mr. Glynn, Mr. Fisher, Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Salmon, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. McWilliams, and the mover.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—I do not propose to speak at any length upon this question. To my mind, any inquiries that might be made by a Committee would simply tend to show the urgency of passing a measure of this kind. I see no need, therefore, for the appointment of a Select Committee. Honorable members have sufficient acquaintance with commercial affairs to justify them in considering and passing a measure of this kind without referring it to the investigation of such a body; though, of course, if it can be shown that any of the clauses of the Bill would operate unfairly towards honest traders, they should be amended. This sudden desire for the appointment of a Select Committee seems strange to me, seeing that some of those who support the motion of the honorable member for Kooyong have expressed strong opinions against the appointment of Select Committees, because of the cost, and for other reasons. But when delay is wished for, or other motives actuate them, they seem to put aside these opinions. I am not sure whether the honorable and learned member for Parkes last night charged me with possessing class bias because I had shown round the Chamber samples of adulterated goods, or because I had discovered the adulteration. If to feel strongly against all kinds of fraud, and against the deliberate deception by vendors of those with whom they do business, is to be biased, I confess that I am so biased. The need for legislation of this kind must be recognised, and the only point for consideration is whether the Bill as framed may, or may not, be detrimental to trade. It is claimed that one of its clauses will require the grading of exports by Commonwealth officials; but I fail to see that that is so. As I understand the clause in question, it means that such goods shall be stamped to show their quality, and that provision will naturally lead to the grading of produce by exporters or manufacturers; and recognised qualities will come to be established in various trades. But to protect the honest trader, penalties must be imposed for the dishonest description of goods, and the Customs-house officials must be the judges in the first instance of whether goods are or are not properly stamped. Surely no objection will be taken to a provision requiring the marking of the weight on every package. The sale of light-weight goods seems to be increasing under the present system. A buyer asks for a packet of candles, believing that he will receive 1 lb., and gets 12 ounces; or for a tin of jam, believing that it will contain 1 lb., and receives 14 ounces. Of course, in such cases he could protect himself if he were allowed to weigh the contents of the tin or package; but the vendor would never permit that. I cannot understand the opposition to the measure which has been exhibited by some honorable members who supported the late Government, since the Bill was framed by that Government. They seem to think that the present Government would administer its provisions unfairly. I do not think that that is a fair position to take, because I feel sure that the departmental officials will administer the law in the same way under this Government as under any other Government. The honorable and learned member for Parkes last night gave us one of his usual lectures upon the common law of England, and told us that it was recognised by the Courts that when two persons entered into a contract they had to abide by it, even though one might afterwards find out that he did not get exactly what he bargained for. But if a person sells me a pair of boots as made of leather, while some material portion of them is cardboard, I have a remedy against him, even at common law, because it is impossible for the buyer in such a case to discover by an ordinary examination the nature of the material used. I was surprised to hear, too, in this connexion, the apparent approval of the honorable member for Parramatta of the English system of dealing only with imports. The fact that the legislation of England has not prevented the exportation of goods which are not what they purport to be, has had a good deal to do with the large importations of shoddy to Australia, especially in the old days, when anything was considered good enough for the Colonies. Apparently the honorable member wishes us to follow the same policy. I think that the measure should not be made too narrow, and I urge the Minister not to accept the suggestion to confine its application to articles of food and such things as patent medicines. I would extend it to apparel, and make it apply to Inter-State trade, as I am given to understand by those who pretend to legal knowledge that we can make it so apply. I have here, for the edification of honorable members, a number of samples which show the nature of some of the goods which are now being manufactured in Melbourne and sold locally or sent to the other States. My first sample is a piece of paper made to represent leather, and used as a kind of inner sole for men's boots. Then I have an in-sole of a child's boot, stamped out of a cardboard hat-box. I have another sample of paper which so closely imitates leather that it would be impossible for almost any one but an expert to discover that it is not leather. Another exhibit is a child's shoe, the only leather in which is a very thin piece, of inferior quality, on the sole, the rest of the shoe being made of cardboard, so far as the sole is concerned, and cotton for the upper. I have also a sample of leather made up of shavings and waste pieces, which have been pressed together and rolled. This composition is used for boot heels. There are about eight layers of thin shavings, but directly the material is put into water, it becomes soft.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Would the Bill prevent the sale of such articles?

Mr. SPENCE.—We have no power to deal with the sale of goods which are manufactured in and not exported from any of the States; but the Governments of the States have already done something to prevent adulteration in those circumstances, and we can prevent the exportation from one State to another of adulterated goods. We can prevent, for instance, the exportation of boots made from materials such as I have shown to Sydney, where free-traders, who think the imported article is always better than the locally-made article, are being victimized by buying as leather what is really paper.

Mr. CROUCH.—Is the honorable member sure that these things are Australian made?

Mr. SPENCE.—A great deal of the cardboard is imported.

Mr. TUDOR.—These materials are used all over the world at the present time.

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes. The making of sole leather out of waste pieces is quite a feature of the American trade, I believe. The point I wish to emphasize is that these materials are being used in Melbourne factories for the manufacture of boots worn in Victoria, or exported to other States. I wish to check the exportation of such goods, to protect the consumers of the other States. As a rule the free-traders of this House are very ready to champion the cause of the consumers; but in discussing this Bill they seem to have forgotten the consumers, and to be considering only the manufacturers.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Bill does not provide for the protection of the consumers.

Mr. SPENCE.—I think that it does. In any case, we should make it provide for their protection. The Bill compels producers to stamp their goods according to weight, quality, and grade. This, I think, will compel the various trades to grade their goods.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Then the Bill provides for grading.

Mr. SPENCE.—The contention of the honorable member, that the effect of the Bill will be to create a system of Government grading, deserves consideration, but as I read the measure that will not be its effect. What I believe to be the intention is that the exporter of goods shall state whether they are of first, second, or third grade. If an article of number 3 grade is marked as of number 1 grade, the error should be corrected by the Customs authorities. It appears to me that the Bill would insure that.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—An article may be introduced under a perfectly true description, and although it may not be a genuine product, may yet pass into consumption. We have no control over it after it has once been imported.

Mr. SPENCE.—If a purchaser buy an article with a full knowledge of its quality and character, well and good; but what we should seek to prevent is the deception that takes the form of representing articles to be other than they are. All we can do is to insure that the goods shall be properly described. If the Bill were made to apply to the Inter-State trade, it would have a salutary effect upon our local manufacturers. We should endeavour to bring about a high standard of manufacture for Australian goods, which we wish our own people to purchase. Honorable members will find, on reference to the last report of the City Health Officer of Sydney, what has been done by means of legislation against the adulteration of foods. Owing to the activity of the health authorities in regard to the adulteration of milk the mortality amongst young children has been very largely reduced. Last year the deaths were 48 per cent. less than in 1903, and 46 per cent. lower than the average for the previous three years. The percentage of cases of adulteration of milk fell from 71 in 1903 to 19 in 1904. The sale of water at 4d. per gallon is a very profitable industry, but the authorities have shown that they can effectively check that form of fraud. The Chambers of Commerce of Australia are making an appeal which is quite characteristic of such bodies. They say that they are in sympathy with the object of the Bill, namely, the prevention of fraud, but they denounce the measure without indicating their real grounds of objection. They adopt this course in regard to every measure that is brought forward with the object of purifying our business methods, and protecting the public against deception. I would not suggest that they desire to encourage dishonest traders, but the methods they adopt certainly lay them open to grave suspicion. I should like them to declare definitely in what respects the Bill is likely to fail in achieving its objects. I think that its scope should be extended to apparel. Serious frauds are perpetrated in connexion with the manufacture of clothing, and I think we should endeavour to protect the public as far as we can by placing under supervision all transfers of apparel from one State to another. I believe that this would have a salutary effect upon our clothing manufactures. I have indicated the extent to which spurious substances are used for manufacturing purposes. I have here a piece of paper which is made up to resemble leather, and is used in the manufacture of cheap furniture. We should do all we can to put a stop to such frauds upon the public. When we have done so we can fairly appeal to the States Governments to co-operate with us in regard to matters which are beyond our control. It may be more difficult for us than for the States to regulate the conditions of manufacture, but if the States fail to take the necessary action we must do all within our power to make good the deficiency, despite the extra cost that may be involved. A number of inferior articles are now in common use, and we can, by means of legislation such as that now proposed, do a great deal towards checking trade frauds. We have heard that barium chloride is used in the manufacture of sole leather in order to add to the weight of the article. It must be extremely profitable to use barium chloride at 1d. per lb., and to sell it at 10d. per lb. Leather thus treated is highly injurious to the health of the people who have to handle it, and upon that ground alone something should be done to put a stop to a highly improper and immoral practice. The impositions upon the public by manufacturers and producers frequently react upon themselves. Honorable members will recollect the case of the butter which was sent from Australia to South Africa during the time of the Boer war. The butter was put up in tins which were supposed to contain 1 lb. each, but on examination the contents were found to be 4 ozs. short of the declared weight. The consignment was rejected by the Imperial authorities, and the butter was afterwards sold in Johannesburg at 5s. 3d. per dozen tins. That transaction practically ruined the Australian butter trade in South Africa. It has been argued by some honorable members that we cannot exercise any control over our produce after it leaves our ports, but it is extremely unlikely that any goods would be repacked on arrival at London, or elsewhere, with a view to imposing on the public. In regard to soap, for instance, it is very necessary that the exact weight of each bar should be stamped upon it, so that the purchasers may know exactly what they are buying. Soap is made up in the form of 28, 32, 36, and 40 bars to the cwt., but many people are under the impression that one bar of soap is the same as another, so far as the weight is concerned, and, in consequence, are frequently imposed upon. Then again, we have been informed that from 20 to 70 per cent. of cotton has been used in the manufacture of Colonial flannels. We cannot control the manufacture of these goods, but we can at least exercise supervision over those which are transferred from State to State. I have directed the attention of honorable members to the rubbish that is used in the manufacture of children's shoes. The paper, which is substituted for leather, immediately soaks up water like a sponge, and instead of protecting the child against damp and cold is likely to visit upon it the most serious consequences. It is desirable that we should regulate the sale of patent medicines, but it is still more important that we should exercise supervision over the manufacture of articles of food and clothing. The object of the Bill is to insure that all articles exported from Australia shall be described according to their quality. The Victorian Government have accomplished much good by means of their system of grading exports, and I regard the Bill as another step in the direction of securing a good name for Australian products in the markets of the world and of protecting the home consumer.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—Honorable members know from the remarks which I made yesterday upon the motion submitted by the honorable and learned member for Corio, that I sincerely deprecate adding to the Select Committees which are already in existence. I have previously stated my opinion that it is the Government alone who should accept the initial responsibility for all legislation submitted to this Chamber. That legislation, I contend, should be the finished product of the combined intelligence of the Cabinet; and it is only when I am satisfied that the necessary amount of forethought and consideration has not been devoted to Bills introduced into this House that I will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to perform the work which properly attaches to Ministers.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member objected to the appointment of a Select Committee only yesterday.

Mr. KELLY.—If the honorable member had been present a few minutes ago he would have heard me reiterate my objections to the unnecessary appointment of Select Committees. The creation of such a body is only justified when the Cabinet have not given to measures submitted to the House that concerted consideration which they should bestow upon them. I think it must be very clear to honorable members that Ministers have not collectively considered this Bill. We have merely to look at that portion of it which relates to grading in order to discover that. Up to date three Ministers have expressed themselves upon the measure, so far as the question of grading is concerned. In the first place the Attorney-General scarcely seemed to know what the Bill intended. When the honorable member for North Sydney asked him, "What about grading"? he found the question so awkward and unexpected that the best reply he could give was, "Am I not to have the opportunity to put together a few connected sentences"? Later on the honorable and learned gentleman, having had time to turn over in his mind the possibilities of this measure, made the following declaration:—

We are not taking the power to create qualities, grades, sizes, weights, and ingredients.

At a subsequent stage the honorable member for North Sydney inquired—

Has the Attorney-General finished what he had to say in regard to grading?

To which the Attorney-General replied—

I am trying to answer the honorable member's questions. We do not intend to create grades.

The honorable member for North Sydney thereupon asked—

The Government do not intend to grade?

and the Attorney-General answered—this time a little bit staggered, because he scented danger in the insistence of the honorable member's question—

It all depends upon what the honorable member means by grading.

In view of this remarkable change of front on the part of the Attorney-General, it is obvious not only that the honorable and learned gentleman has not considered the Bill concertedly with the Cabinet, but that he himself has not considered it upon its merits. The bulk of his statements were to the effect that it does not contemplate dealing with grading. But the Minister who is in charge of the Bill tells another tale. He says—

There is to be sufficient grading to enable us to distinguish bad goods from good goods.

If there is to be that amount of grading, it is perfectly clear that the Bill makes provision for grading. It will thus be seen that two responsible Ministers, who should have jointly considered this measure before it was submitted to the House, directly contradict each other as to one of the most important phases of it. The Vice-President of the Executive Council is even more emphatic than is the Attorney-General. He declared that no one with any sense would think that this bill meant grading. Thus we find that three Ministers entertain different views of the measure, clearly proving that they have not concertedly considered it, although the far-reaching character of its provisions in itself should have rendered such consideration imperative. It behoves the House, in defence of the trade which we have already built up, and in protection of the interests which Australia possesses, to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, since the Government have proved so recreant to their duty. The honorable member for Darling attempted to make a great point this morning by exhibiting certain articles which had been sold under the false pretence that they were made of leather. The material, which he exhibited as leather, consisted either of paper or leather shavings, and shows that a miserable fraud has been practised upon the poor people who purchased it in the belief that it was the genuine article. But in urging that view, the honorable member for Darling provided me with the very best argument that can be employed against the Bill. The measure will not protect the local consumer at all. Under its operation the same materials can be imported, so long as they are correctly described. They may be brought into the Commonwealth as "fancy paper" and afterwards sold to the local boot manufacturer, who may convert them into boots purporting to be "leather" for the children of the poorer class of people. The Bill deals only with imports and exports. Even in regard to these matters it does not go far enough, if there be anything in the benefits which, it is predicted, will accrue from its operation. I repeat that under the Bill any goods may be imported, so long as they are properly described. For instance, materials may be imported as "imitation leather," and after they have been admitted they may be converted into any article that the manufacturer chooses.

MR. GROOM.—Does not the honorable member think that the States could deal with that matter?

MR. KELLY.—Most certainly I do. The States alone can deal with the practice of defrauding the consumer. In the first place, we have to consider the class of goods to which this measure is intended to apply. The Minister of Trade and Customs, in introducing it, submitted a long list of articles which were likely to be affected by its operation. These included all food-stuffs, loots and shoes, furniture, and apparel, and a number of other articles ranging through all branches of commerce. Shortly afterwards, however, the honorable gentleman, who ought in all reason to have been thoroughly satisfied, before introducing the Bill, as to the particular articles which should be affected by it, received a deputation from the commercial bodies of the Commonwealth in respect of its provisions. In reply to that deputation, he said that he would introduce an amendment which would confine the operation of the Bill to patent medicines and food products.

SIR WILLIAM LYNE.—If I have done wrong in endeavouring to meet honorable members opposite, I will make the Bill apply to all the articles to which I previously referred.

MR. KELLY.—The Minister may endeavour to lead me into a false position, but I am not quite so young as he always describes me. Immediately after submitting the measure to this House, the Minister assured a deputation that it would not cover more than half the scope which it was originally intended to cover. Now he is prepared if he meets with any further opposition to see that the original scope of the Bill is maintained. He has no particular responsibility in regard to the matter, and is quite prepared to see the Bill passed in whatever form the House chooses.

MR. GROOM.—This is a deliberative assembly, and he wishes to know what proposals the honorable member has to make.

MR. KELLY.—It is a deliberative assembly, which used to be presided over by a responsible Government; but if any Government is prepared to allow the Opposition or any other party in the House to take upon itself the responsibility for Bills, and to deal with the general trend of legislation, it is a sorry event for the Commonwealth.

MR. GROOM.—Are they not to listen to proposals from all sides of the House?

MR. KELLY.—Three Ministers have expressed largely conflicting views in regard to the measure, and now we have a fourth coming forward. My honorable and learned friend urges that it is only right that the Government should consider proposals from all sections of the House. I entirely agree with him; but I think he will see that the Ministry should not accede to a proposal unless they are satisfied that it is a right one. The Minister first said the Bill should deal with a wide range of articles; therefore he thought it beneficial that it should deal with those articles. He afterwards agreed to restrict the operations of the measure; therefore he then thought that it would not be beneficial to include articles formerly included. Now we find him prepared, if he meets any opposition to that proposition, to deliberately agree to the Bill being passed in a form which he has admitted would not be in the interests of Australia. Here we have a picture of responsible government which is not likely to encourage any belief in the future usefulness of this House.

Mr. CHANTER.—Is there not a responsible Parliament, as well as responsible Government?

Mr. KELLY.—Certainly there is; and that is why this Parliament, as a responsible body; should see that the Government which direct its deliberations, submit to it the product of their combined intelligence, or at all events take the responsibility for the recommendations they make. The present Government can apparently accept no responsibility for anything they may do. It seems strange that they should be so prepared to jump backward and forward in relation to their proposals.

Mr. GROOM.—But what is the particular principle of legislation that the honorable member wishes to emphasize?

Mr. KELLY.—The particular principle I am laying down is that all proposed legislation should be considered by the Government, and that it is only when it is obvious that a Bill has not been so considered that the House should take the extreme step of appointing a Select Committee to inquire first of all whether there is any necessity and call for the proposed measure, and secondly whether it is designed in the interests it is intended to conserve. Honorable members, from whatever side they have spoken, have shown that they really believe, in view of all the different attitudes adopted by the Ministry, that the Bill has not been properly considered. Such being the fact, I fail to see why the Government should object to the appointment of this Select Committee. The Committee proposed will be an expert one. All legislation of this kind in the House of Commons is first submitted to Select Committees specially qualified to deal with it. In the United States the same procedure is adopted. But our House is obviously too small to permit of the formation of a number of standing committees of that kind; and for that reason we should be all the more careful to see that the Government properly consider all measures before submitting them to us. It would be utterly useless for us to attempt in Committee to frame a Bill of such a far-reaching character as this is. We could not bring it into anything like reasonable proportions. Let me give one instance of the difficulties in the way. We know that if one wants to retain possession of a market, one must consider the demands of that market. It has been strongly urged in Australia, as well as in other markets of English manufacturers, that the reason the latter are not keeping abreast of foreign manufacturers is mainly because they make an article to suit themselves, and not to suit the market for which it is intended. What are we proposing to do in this Bill, but to make all goods conform to certain grades and standards of quality? Is it not proposed to provide that all the goods that we send to different markets of the world shall be on exactly the same plan? It is very clear that in so doing we are falling into the same mistake that the people of the mother country, according to our view, have committed, in trying to treat all markets, not from the point of view of the consumer, but from the stand-point of the manufacturer. The honorable member for Parramatta touched on one interesting phase of this very wide question. He dealt with the difficulties which must arise in our markets in the East as the result of the passing of this measure. What the honorable gentleman said in that regard has been the subject of some criticism on the part of certain honorable members in this House; but I do say that the gist of his remarks is borne out by what little knowledge I have of the character of the Eastern markets. We all know that those markets are intensely conservative in their tendency. It is only as the result of persistent hard work that a firm is able to establish a market for its products in the East. It is common knowledge in the East, even if it is not in this House, that new traders to that part of the world endeavour, by imitating articles that have already gained a foothold there, to secure some sort of spurious footing for their wares. I give this as an instance in support of my contention. I know of an article which, after gaining a large market in the East, was suddenly confronted with the competition of another. The merchant introducing the latter article was careful to see that it was wrapped up in a package which bore a name that, while different from that of the vendors of the original article, contained exactly the same number of letters. The package was the same both in colour and shape, although the contents were different. The company first in the field endeavoured to obtain an injunction to prevent the sale of this colorable imitation of their own product; but, as their efforts in that direction failed, they took the unfortunate step of printing their own name in broad bold letters across the label on their packages. The result of this was that they lost the market. Their manufacture was never asked for again. It was not the article, but the covering, that these Eastern people wanted. This is only one of many instances that might be given of the extreme conservatism of the Eastern market; and I urge that the House should take it into serious consideration before passing legislation that will inevitably render it necessary for exporters to put certain brands and marks on the labels of goods sent abroad, and thus possibly destroy the markets in the East that have been built up by Australian enterprise.

Mr. CULPIN.—Does not that argument cut both ways?

Mr. KELLY.—I do not think it does. Trade in the East is built up as the result of much laborious effort; and, once secured, it may be held for all time, if our traders are not guilty of the folly which the House, by passing this Bill, would have them commit. As honorable members know, goods are sent out in large parcels; and say, for the sake of argument, that we provided that each parcel, instead of each unit, should be marked in a certain way before being exported to China. Only an expert committee could decide whether articles could not be sent under such conditions to the East, and afterwards reshipped to other markets, where this system might or might not be advantageous. It is obvious that all these different phases of trade must be very seriously considered before the House is asked to embark on such sweeping legislation as that with which we are now asked to deal.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY. — Does not the honorable member believe that commercial honesty is the best policy?

Mr. KELLY.—I certainly do.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—If a Chinaman had a 16-oz. stomach, would the honorable member give him only 14 ozs. of Australian butter with which to fill it?

Mr. KELLY.—As to their being any ullage in tinned goods sent to China, I may say at once that the Chinese are by no means the innocent people that the House appears to imagine. On the contrary, they are very shrewd in some ways. When it is once found in China that there is an ullage—I am dealing now solely with the Eastern trade, as showing that this measure cannot be assimilated to every export trade we have—in an article, that article in a very short time is run off the market. The Chinese, as a trading people, are very honest.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is not characteristic of the Chinese we know in Australia.

Mr. KELLY.—If my honorable friend would inquire he would find that the Chinese merchant has as good a reputation for honesty as has the merchant of any other country. I am by no means opposed to the White Australia idea, but I always desire to give credit where it is due. If I have repeated anything which the honorable member for Parramatta has said, it has been unconsciously, because I was not present when he made his speech. I put this fact before the House to show the care which we should exercise in regard to any measure regulating commerce. This Bill does not protect the local consumer. If it did, that would be a solid reason for pressing for its consideration in this Chamber without delay.

Mr. TUDOR.—It protects the consumer so far as imports are concerned.

Mr. KELLY.—No; because the local merchant may deal as he likes with the goods which he has imported, once they have passed through the Customs barrier.

Mr. TUDOR.—Does the honorable member think that the local merchant would be so dishonest as to alter labels?

Mr. KELLY.—That would not be necessary. The paper made to imitate leather for use in the manufacture of boots and shoes, which the honorable member for Darling exhibited here this morning, could be imported as paper or imitation leather.

Mr. SPENCE.—But it would not pay to re-make imported boots made partly of imitation leather.

Mr. KELLY.—If articles manufactured of shoddy cannot be imported, the shoddy will be imported, and made up locally. Surely honorable members do not wish to encourage so miserable and deceitful an industry as that?

Mr. SPENCE.—The States could put an end to that.

Mr. KELLY.—Yes; but we should not pass legislation which may encourage such a thing. The promiscuous use of patent medicines is a matter which can be dealt with only by States legislation. The States Governments could, if they liked, lend us the services of their Health Departments, or we could appoint a body similar to the Apothecary's Hall in England; but it would be ridiculous for the Customs Department to be allowed to determine what patent medicines would be injurious to the public health, and what would not. It is generally not the medicines per se that are harmful, but their universal application to all complaints, as advised in the advertisements recommending them. The representatives of the medical fraternity in this House will bear me out in that statement. To deal with the patent medicine curse, we must have a properly constituted body like the English Apothecary's Hall, whose business it will be to watch, not only the importations, but the advertisements of patent medicines, to see that they are not advertised to cure complaints for which they are inefficacious. All that the Bill does is to give the Minister power to prohibit the importation of patent medicines, and thus to protect the local manufacturer of these nostrums. It gives the public no protection, however. I urge these points for the consideration of honorable members. The Bill does not do what it is urged that it is intended to do, but will undoubtedly seriously interfere with our external trade.

Mr. TUDOR.—Will the honorable member assist to make it as effective as possible?

Mr. KELLY.—If the Commonwealth had the power to act for the protection of the people of Australia in these matters, I would be with the honorable member, because I am certainly not an advocate of false trading. I say, however, that the Bill will not have the effect of preventing the sale of goods under false trade descriptions, and for that and the other reasons which I have given I urge the adoption of the motion of the honorable member for Kooyong, so that a thorough investigation may be made in regard to it.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I have listened very patiently to this debate, so far as I could, because one cannot remain in the Chamber for more than a couple of hours without suffering physical inconvenience.

Mr. KELLY.—Other honorable members had on one occasion to wait here four and a half hours to hear a speech delivered by the honorable member.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The physical inconvenience I speak of is not such as might result from having to listen to the honorable member's utterances but is due to the impure condition of the atmosphere caused by defective ventilation. So far as my health has permitted, I have attended in the Chamber to hear the speeches made in connexion with the Commerce Bill, and I cannot help being impressed with the similarity of the utterances of the members of the Opposition. The last speaker is a great imitator of others in the composition of his speeches. Almost every argument which he used just now, except such as were drawn by spoon-feeding interjections, had been used by other members of his party who had preceded him. He generally commences his discourses by quoting from the Hansard reports of previous speeches, and dwells on them ad nauseam, adding nothing novel or original to the debate. This resurrection pie style of speaking is very tiring to those who have to listen to it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Will the honorable member discuss the Bill?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I claim the right to reply to the remarks of the honorable member in regard to the measure, and his attempts to humiliate the Minister and others who support the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is to the Bill, and not to the conduct of any honorable member, that the honorable gentleman must address himself.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I cannot understand the opposition to the Bill, since it is known that its object is to do all that the Commonwealth authorities can do to purify our export and import trades. The honorable and learned member for Parkes last night assumed, as he usually does, that in his personality is summed up all the reasonableness and logic of the Chamber, and pretended to be unable to discover, even with a microscope, the presence here of any other level-headed man. Then, in his grandiloquent manner, he proceeded to deal with the arguments of previous speakers, though he could not at the outset refrain from having a quiet dig at the Labour Party, who, he says, in their attitude towards this measure are influenced by sentiment and strong bias. I think that that remark could more fairly be applied to those who are opposing the Bill. I maintain that the honorable and learned member for Parkes was wrong in his premises and, therefore, arrived at entirely erroneous conclusions. He said that if the Government had adopted the Bill which was framed by their predecessors, they would have had the support of honorable members generally. He asserted further that the present Government had eliminated from the measure the principal clause in the draft Bill, and had thereby robbed the measure of its usefulness. That statement is utterly misleading. So far from the present Government having eliminated any provision that would have made the measure more effective, they dropped a clause of a far more stringent character than any now embodied in the Bill. That clause read—

The Governor-General may by proclamation prohibit the importation or introduction into Australia of any goods which do not comply with the standard prescribed by regulation or proclamation.

Instead of proposing to take power to prohibit the importation of goods, the Government seek authority which will enable them to insure that goods shall be truly described. Honorable members of the Opposition have devoted hour after hour to the expression of their objections to grading, and yet they would readily have supported a measure containing a provision such as I have quoted. In that clause, it was proposed to set up a standard under which every article would have to be graded. Honorable members, who are opposing the Bill, have urged that the Government have entirely forgotten the consumers, but they know full well that the powers of the Commonwealth are limited by the Constitution. The Constitution permits the Commonwealth to deal only with imports and exports, and since the advent of Inter-State free-trade no means are available to us of exercising supervision over goods which may be transferred from one State to another. Honorable members have urged that because we cannot go beyond the Customs House, we should not do anything—that because we cannot legislate within the State domain, we must not exercise such powers as are conferred upon us by the Constitution. Such arguments are a hollow mockery, and should stand to the eternal discredit of those honorable members who have used them. I am becoming convinced that there is very little sincerity in many of the arguments that are used on the floor of this House, and in other Parliaments of which I have had experience. Honorable members employ just such arguments as may suit their party purposes, and frequently take up an attitude contrary to that which would be dictated by their own convictions.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is not discussing the Bill.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am now dealing with the arguments used and the methods adopted by the opponents of the measure.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member would be perfectly in order in replying to any arguments used by opponents of the Bill; but he is not in order in saying that in general the arguments used in this and other Parliaments are not sincere. That is an abstract question that has no bearing on the Bill.

Mr. WEBSTER.—My remarks may be unparliamentary, and if so, I shall have to refrain from continuing them. I regret it very much.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I was not questioning the accuracy of the honorable member's statements, but was pointing out that a general discussion upon parliamentary sincerity is beside the question now before us.

Mr. WEBSTER.—My remarks may be unparliamentary, but they may be freely expressed in another place, and I shall take care that they are so expressed. The duty of protecting the consumer rests upon the States, and it is to be hoped that when the Commonwealth has done all that lies in its power, the States authorities will follow its example. In view of the provisions contained in the Bill prepared by the Reid Government, it is absurd for honorable members opposite to object to what they call grading.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is the difference between grading and standardization?

Mr. WEBSTER. — I can see no difference whatever, except in the terms, and, therefore, I cannot understand why honorable members should so strongly argue against the provision contained in the Bill. Honorable members opposite have admitted that some supervision is required to prevent the community from being imposed upon by manufacturers and others, and yet they object to legislation framed with that object. I do not think that they have any real objection to the Bill, but I believe that they regard it as necessary for party purposes to oppose every proposal brought forward by the Government. The measure is intended to put down nefarious practices on the part of commercial men, and to guard our people against having foisted upon them adulterated foods and other articles. Surely these are worthy objects. This Bill is also necessary in order to preserve the reputation of our exports in the markets of the world. Time will not permit me to enlarge upon the extent to which those markets have been affected, so far as the Commonwealth is concerned, by placing upon them inferior articles labelled as Australian, to the manifest detriment of our producers. It behoves us to do what we can to restrict the operations of unscrupulous importers and exporters, who have hitherto disgraced the calling to which they belong, and to teach wrongdoers that they cannot with impunity undermine the reputation of our commerce. That is a duty which clearly attaches to this Parliament. Some honorable members, for whom I entertain the greatest admiration as men, make me feel—when I hear the arguments which they adduce upon matters of this kind—that they must have a dual existence. Unfortunately, I cannot separate the politician from the man. We owe it to our constituents that we should preserve them from imposition, fraud, and deception. That should be our first consideration. This Bill seeks to apply to goods, imported and exported, such restrictive laws as our Constitution will permit. Beyond that we cannot go. I am glad that the honorable member for North Sydney has just entered the Chamber, because he must know that the Bill which the late Government had prepared for submission to this House contained a clause, the effect of which would have been to overthrow all the arguments advanced by members of the Opposition in respect of grading. If the honorable member had been upon this side of the Chamber, he would have been as tenacious in his support of that provision as he is in his opposition to this measure.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member should not say that, because the Bill to which he refers was never approved by the late Cabinet.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I have no knowledge of that matter. I can only speak of the provisions of the Bill in the form in which it was drafted. I contend that the clauses of the measure now under consideration are both liberal and necessary. I disagree with the action of the Minister of Trade and Customs if he has given a promise—and I believe that he has—to limit the operation of the Bill to food products and patent medicines. I claim that if it is necessary to exercise control over food products, it is equally necessary to do so in respect of wearing apparel. A child who is compelled to wear boots made from brown paper is much more in need of protection than is the child who suffers as the result of taking too many doses of Mother Seigel's Syrup.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—This Bill does not touch that.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member knows that we cannot go beyond the powers conferred upon us by the Constitution.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member is implying that we can.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am doing no such thing. I say that as far as we can constitutionally exercise control over these goods, we should do so. When we hear the honorable and learned member for Parkes speak upon questions of this kind, we begin to wonder whether we are men of common sense. It is his constant endeavour to impress upon us the inferiority of those whom he is addressing. He adopts an exalted tone that is absolutely unapproachable by any other member of the House. When we talk about legislation that is pending, he begins to quote common law, and all sorts of law, with a view to confounding us. I am sure that when professing last night to be so intensely interested in the welfare of the consumer, he must have known that our sole desire was to afford that individual protection. In passing this Bill, we shall be making a determined effort to protect the community from dishonest importers and exporters.

Question so resolved in the negative.

In Committee:

Clause 1—

This Act may be cited as the Commerce Act 1905, and shall commence on a day to be fixed by proclamation.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—One of the strongest objections I have to the Bill is that it leaves everything to be done by the Minister. It is not even to come into operation except on a day to be fixed by proclamation. I would ask the Minister if he can see his way to have some definite date fixed when the measure will come into operation, so that the trading community will be able to make sufficient preparation to meet the disabilities to which it will subject them.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—I propose to move an amendment providing that the measure shall be known as "The Adulteration and Fraudulent Representation Act, 1905." Much of the misconception in regard to this Bill has arisen from the fact that it is wrongly named. The Minister has been assured that it is the desire of the Opposition to assist the Government in preventing adulteration and fraud, but we object to the Bill being placed on the statute-book as one dealing with the trade and commerce of the whole Commonwealth. When the proper time arrives, we shall ask the Government to consent to the title being altered, so that it will read, "A Bill for an Act to prevent adulteration and fraudulent representation." If that amendment be made, the object of the Bill will at once be clear and definite. But the use of the general title "A Bill for an Act relating to Commerce" will lead the outside world to believe that it has a distinctly different intention. So far as the Bill is designed to prevent adulteration and fraudulent representation in regard to goods, it has the approval of the commercial community; but I would point out that the departmental measure which the honorable member for Gippsland had not time to thoroughly consider during his administration bore a different title. The very fact that the Bill is described as the "Commerce Bill" has given rise to much of the opposition to it, and has caused many people to attribute to it a scope and intention that are not inherent to the Bill itself.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—Before the honorable member submits his amendment I should like to make a short statement to the Committee. I promise him that if one or two clauses in the Bill be amended—as they probably will be—with the result that the Bill resolves itself into such a measure as he has described, I shall have no objection to the recommittal of clause 1, with a view to insert a fitting title.

Mr. KNOX.—I am satisfied with the Minister's offer.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I move—

That the following words be added—"not being earlier than the 1st July, 1906."

Much of the trouble that arose in connexion with the Sea Carriage of Goods Act was due to the fact that it was brought into force without sufficient notice. It is still more important that this measure should not be proclaimed until traders have had an opportunity to instruct their agents and correspondents abroad to comply with all the conditions—and in some respects they are onerous—which is impossible if the Act should be brought into operation at once. I think that the date I have named is the earliest that should be fixed; but it is rather an open question whether it would not be wise to determine that the Act shall not commence until 1st September. The Ministry might consider the expediency of extending the date if the session should not terminate before the end of the year. The amendment is a simple one, and does not at all affect the principles of the Bill. As a matter of fact, I favour some of its principles, although I think that it goes too far in certain directions. The amendment should be passed, in justice to those who will have to accommodate themselves to a new set of conditions.

Mr. McLEAN (Gippsland).—I trust that I shall be in order in explaining shortly the reasons that induced me to have the first Bill relating to these matters drafted, because it appears to me that the original intention has been departed from. Honorable members will remember that a resolution was carried last session, on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, in favour of the establishment of a Federal Agricultural Bureau. The matter was left in my hands by the Government of which I was a member, and, after a thorough investigation, I found that it would be undesirable to duplicate any service at present being performed by the Agricultural Departments of the States. It appeared to me, after an exhaustive inquiry, that the functions which pertained more particularly to a Federal Department, acting on behalf of all the States, were those of controlling all imports and exports relating to agricultural matters, and of collecting and disseminating all information that would be of value to the agriculturists of the Commonwealth. Furthermore, it seemed to me that we should provide for the collection of information regarding the soils and climatic conditions of the various parts of Australia, and the different products for the cultivation of which each part was suited. I mentioned the matter to Dr. Wollaston, the Comptroller-General of Customs, and he pointed out that the only legislative powers that were necessary in that direction related to imports and exports—that any other function which it was desirable to perform in the way of collecting useful information, either here or abroad, of opening up markets in other countries, and of ascertaining all the conditions under which our products should enter those markets, could be carried out simply by making the necessary appointments and voting the salaries on the Estimates. He pointed out that it would only be necessary—and this opinion was confirmed by the Attorney-General, whom I consulted on the matter—to take legislative powers in regard to the control of imports and exports. I also went carefully into the matter with one of the experts of the Victorian Department of Agriculture, a gentleman who, I regret to say, is no longer connected with it. I refer to Dr. Howell, who is certainly one of the most excellent experts that Australia has known. He thoroughly agreed with me and with the objects I had in view, and placed at my disposal a lot of literature showing the methods adopted in this respect by the United States. There they fix standards of purity and excellence in regard to every product that is exported, and those products have to conform with the standards fixed before they can be sent abroad. The board which fixes the standards is drawn from different bodies. The Agricultural Department and the Health Departments of the different States are largely represented on it, and the commerce interests are also represented. The board fixes standards which comply with the requirements of health, without interfering with the commercial and agricultural interests of the country. My intention was to do here in a small way what is being done in the United States, to adopt proper standards of purity and excellence, with which our export trade should comply, and, for the protection of our people, to subject importations to similar conditions. The Bill as drawn contains general powers extending to all commodities, and I had not time to revise it before leaving the Department. My intention was to go into the matter thoroughly, making such alterations as were necessary or desirable before submitting the draft measure to my colleagues. But when I left the Department it had not been so revised, nor had it been submitted to the Cabinet. I am sorry that since that time my health has not allowed me to follow the course of legislation here as I should have liked to do. I thought it well to place before the House the reasons which have actuated me in this matter. I confined my attention to imports and exports of food products for the use of man and beast, in compliance with the order of the House in regard to the establishment of an agricultural bureau, and I think that it would have been preferable to so restrict the application of the Bill at first, extending it afterwards, if necessary, in such directions as might be thought best.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—If the honorable member presses his amendment I must oppose it, because I think it unwise to arbitrarily provide that the Bill shall not come into force for so long a period as nine or ten months ahead. I admit that it is only fair that those who have orders on the sea shall be given notice of the intended change in our law.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is not only those who have goods on the sea who are affected.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—In some cases contracts have been entered into which have a considerable time yet to run.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Where orders had been given before the provisions of the Bill could be known, it would be unfair to catch the merchants on the hop, so to speak.

Mr. LONSDALE.—As they were caught in regard to certain bags.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I know all about that business, and so did the merchants concerned. It would be unwise to fix a date so far ahead as the honorable member for South Sydney wishes to fix for the coming into force of the measure.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I made the interjection about the bags, not that I know anything of the merits of the case, but because I am aware that it has been complained by persons interested that if sufficient notice had been given of what would be required the trouble would not have arisen. I know one man who had to go out of business because he had not time to get done what was wanted. Apparently the Minister did not give sufficient notice to allow of the alteration of machinery necessary to carry out his directions. It appears to me that in all cases where an alteration of the law is to be made, and especially where the alterations are so numerous and so serious as in this case, ample notice should be given to those concerned.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am willing to consent to the postponement of the operation of the measure until the end of March next.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (New South Wales).—When the honorable gentleman remembers how far-reaching are the provisions of the Bill, I think he will see reason for agreeing to the amendment. Clause 7 provides that the Governor-General may prohibit the importation or introduction into Australia of any goods specified in a proclamation, unless there is applied to them a trade description of a certain character. It may not be required only that the trade description shall be a true one. If that was likely to be the only requirement, there would not be so much need for the postponement of the operation of the measure. What will be required will be compliance with a certain description laid down by the Minister. The Minister will decide what description shall be applied. We do not know how long after the coming into force of the Act this proclamation will be issued.

Mr. DEAKIN.—What we are now considering is the date of the commencement of the Act. The issue of the proclamation will be subsequent to the coming into force of the Act, and the proclamation may announce a still later date for the taking effect of its provisions.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Nothing unjust will be done to those who have already sent orders.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Minister's statement, to some extent, gets over the difficulty, but it must be remembered that the Act will require many alterations in the present practice. Intimation of the changes in the law will have to be sent abroad, new orders and specifications must be framed, labels must be altered and reprinted, goods must be specially prepared for this market, and when everything is complete, shipped out here by sailing vessels. All these changes will take a long time to effect, and I do not think that the delay asked for by the honorable member for South Sydney is too long. It would not be desirable not to enforce the Act after it had once come into force, nor, on the other hand, would it be right to forfeit shipments of goods which the importers had not had time to label with the descriptions required by the Minister.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—I have every desire to meet honorable members, but if the honorable members for North and South Sydney will consider this matter for a moment they will see—

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—We know more about these things than the Minister does.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have had, at any rate, a great deal of administrative experience, perhaps more than is possessed by any other member of the House. Honorable members seem to forget that considerable time must elapse before any proclamation can be issued. If I am called upon to administer the Act, I propose, first of all, to call upon responsible and trustworthy persons of repute in their several trades to say what would be fair descriptions to require in regard to various kinds of goods.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Hear, hear; all the more reason for delaying the operation of the Act.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The chances are that in some cases the Act will not take effect for a considerable period, but it would be unwise to say that it shall not apply at all for nearly a year to come. I think that I have met the honorable member very fairly in agreeing to postpone its commencement to the 31st March. Between now and then I hope to make arrangements with those who are likely to be affected which will enable the Department to prepare trade descriptions which will not cause friction. A little while ago, some gentlemen from Tasmania and Victoria who are interested in the fruit trade seemed to fear that the Bill would require the sale of apples by weight instead of by the bushel. I knew that apples are always sold wholesale by the bushel, and obtained from them the proper size of the cases which are used, informing them that what would be prescribed would be the proper sized cases customary in the trade. Similarly in the case of smaller fruit. The members of the deputation went away quite satisfied, and I hope to be able to deal with other persons interested in the same way. It does not follow that there will be any serious alteration in a large number of trade practices. I listened with attention to the statement of the honorable member for Gippsland, and I was gratified to learn that I had to a very large extent fallen in with his ideas in making the promises I did to the members of the Chambers of Commerce. Of course, I had not the slightest idea of what was in the honorable member's mind when he drafted his Bill, but I had my own conception of what would be reasonable and practicable by way of a commencement in legislation of this kind. If we find it necessary to extend the scope of the measure, or to modify its provisions in any way, it will be easy to introduce an amending Bill.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—The statement made by the Minister shows that there is no special urgency in connexion with this measure, and I think that we should profit by the experience gained in connexion with the Sea Carriage of Goods Act. I would suggest, therefore, that the clause should be postponed, with a view to the further consideration of the amendment.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—I would point out that my honorable colleague has expressed his willingness to fix a date for the commencement of the Bill. No proclamation could be issued before that date, and my honorable colleague indicated that he did not propose to issue a proclamation until he had inquired into the trade practices followed in every branch of industry likely to be affected. That would all take time, and I think that an arrangement of that kind would meet the requirements of the case. Under clause 7 we can consider the question whether any special term of notice should be given in connexion with the proclamations that are issued.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—I suggest that the Prime Minister should afford the honorable member for South Sydney a further opportunity to move his amendment at a later stage, if he should so desire.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable member will have an opportunity to effect his purpose by amending clause 7.

Mr. KELLY.—At present we are asked to trust the Minister to delay the issue of any proclamation until he has made certain inquiries into trade practices. The intention is an excellent one, but the Minister's action must be governed by the provisions of the Bill, as finally adopted, and we can only gauge the value of his assurance when the Bill has reached its final stages.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I think that we might fairly adopt the 31st March as the date for the commencement of the Bill, if we were quite clear that no proclamation would take effect until extended notice had been given to those affected. It will be necessary to give reasonable notice to those who are trading with us from overseas, so that they may adapt their arrangements to the altered circumstances.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—When the deputation from the Chambers of Commerce waited upon me, I told them that I would be willing to allow a reasonable period to elapse after the passing of the Act before bringing it into operation. They asked for six months, and I was perfectly agreeable to that.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I should be perfectly satisfied if the Minister would agree to provide that the Act would come into operation on a date to be fixed by proclamation not earlier than six months after it has been passed. Many of us know what we are speaking of, and realize that our export and import trade may be seriously hampered if the Act is brought into operation too soon. Certain goods are put up for export from Australia, and if the Act were brought into operation hurriedly, it might be impossible to execute from existing stocks a large number of orders. Similarly, manufacturers of imported goods might be required to supply special trade descriptions, and would find it very difficult to do so in time to execute their orders.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am prepared to meet the honorable member in the way suggested.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Mr. G. B. EDWARDS) agreed to—

That the words “not being earlier than six months from the passing of this Act” be added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3—

In this Act, unless the contrary intention appears—

“Officer” means an officer of Customs.

“Trade description,” in relation to any goods, means any description, statement, indication, or suggestion, direct or indirect—

- (a) as to the nature, number, quantity, quality, purity, class, grade, measure, gauge, size, or weight of the goods; or
- (b) as to the country or place in or at which the goods were made or produced; or
- (c) as to the manufacturer or producer of the goods or the person by whom they were selected, packed, or in any way prepared for the market; or
- (d) as to the mode of manufacturing, producing, selecting, packing, or otherwise preparing the goods; or
- (e) as to the material or ingredients of which the goods are composed, or from which they are derived; or
- (f) as to the goods being the subject of an existing patent, privilege, or copy-right, and includes a Customs entry relating to goods; and any mark which, according to the custom of the trade or common repute, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters, shall be deemed to be a trade description within the meaning of this Act.

“False trade description” means a trade description which, by reason of anything contained therein or omitted therefrom, is false or likely to mislead, in a material respect, as regards the goods to which it is applied, and includes every alteration of a trade description, whether by way of addition, effacement, or otherwise, which makes the description false or likely to mislead in a material respect.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—I should like to know at what stage the Minister proposes to give effect to the assurance of the Attorney-General that it is not intended to introduce a system of grading under the Bill. Would the Minister be agreeable to eliminate the words “class, grade” from paragraph a?

Mr. DEAKIN.—We cannot consent to the elimination of those words. It is not proposed to take power to make new grades, but if grades already exist, the goods must be truly marked.

Mr. KNOX.—Passing from that to another point, I move—

That the words “a Customs entry relating to goods and,” lines 26 and 27, be left out.

Customs entries are passed by junior clerks, and hundreds of them have to be dealt with every day. Under the Customs Act much trouble and vexation was caused owing to the practice adopted by the Customs authorities of regarding mistakes in Customs entries as sufficient ground for instituting prosecutions. Surely if it be necessary to furnish a trade description of certain goods, such description should be supplied by means of some specific document which would come under the notice of the principals of a firm, and not by means of a Customs entry passed through in the ordinary daily routine? I think that it would be improper to make the penalties provided for in the Bill apply to a false entry made by some junior clerk without the knowledge of his principals. This is one of the points which I have been asked by the chambers of commerce to impress upon the Minister.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—I merely wish to say that I cannot accept the amendment of the honorable member, and I would direct his attention to the fact that the words of which he complains have been taken from section 1 of the Imperial Merchandise Marks Act of 1891.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—I would point out to the Minister that under the Customs Act he has power to punish any individual for making a false entry, altogether apart from the provisions of this Bill. The honorable gentleman has stated that the words, “and includes the Customs entry relating to goods,” appear in the Imperial Merchandise Marks Act. The reason for that is obvious. The primary object of that Act was to establish the true source of origin of goods. In many Customs entries the source of origin is stated for the purposes of British statistics, and any false statement in that connexion would very properly be considered a contravention of the Act. Here, however, the situation is a very different one. Under clause 7 the Minister may insist upon the fullest trade description of goods being supplied. He may insist that that description shall set out every ingredient which is contained in an article. The clause under consideration will require that in the Customs entry a full description of every line of goods shall be given. Sheets of paper would be necessary to supply that description in connexion with some imports.

Mr. DEAKIN.—All that the clause provides is that the description must be a true one.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—A "trade description" is defined by clause 3. Under clause 7 the Minister may insist upon that trade description containing certain information. If he does insist upon that, will not clause 3 compel the information in question to appear in the Customs entry?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The whole of it?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Yes.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. Whatever is stated in the Customs entry must be true, and in accordance with the description of the goods as specified in paragraphs a to f.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Let me take as an illustration an article such as mustard, which contains a number of ingredients. The Minister may say that a description shall not be a true description unless it sets out all those ingredients, and gives their proportions. Under the Customs Act the maker of any false entry can be punished. Why should a Customs entry contain the whole trade description which may appear on the label of any article?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not read the clause in that way.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member will see that the provision is to be applied in such manner as may be prescribed. Consequently, we may exclude Customs entries.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I think that there is very great doubt about it, and certainly anything which tends to increase the labour attaching to Customs entries is very undesirable.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I admit that. All I understand by this clause is that a Customs entry—like other statements in respect to goods—must accord with the trade description. That, however, does not render it obligatory to include the whole of a trade description in a Customs entry. However, I promise to look into the matter.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—Under this clause, a Customs entry is a trade description, and a false trade description is defined to mean "a trade description which, by reason of anything contained therein or omitted therefrom, is false or likely to mislead," &c.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, if it is a description which contains anything that is misleading. As long as one adheres to the truth he is safe.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The words "omitted therefrom" seem to me to strengthen the contention of the honorable member for North Sydney that if the clause be rigidly construed it will compel importers to include the whole formula of any article in a Customs entry.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

HOURS OF SITTING: MAIL CONTRACT:
EARLY LETTER CLEARANCE.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—In moving—

That the House do now adjourn,

I wish to make the usual announcement that next week business will be proceeded with in the order in which it appears upon the paper. We shall first deal with the Commerce Bill, and consideration will then be devoted to the Representation Bill, the Census and Statistics Bill, and the Manufactures Encouragement Bill, in that order.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—I would ask the Prime Minister to consider the advisableness of increasing the hours of sitting. Already there are nearly forty items, comprising Bills and notices of motion—all of considerable importance—upon the business-paper, and if we proceed as we have been doing, I fear that, at the close of the session, a number of valuable measures will be sacrificed.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I object to increasing the hours of sitting unless the allowance to honorable members is increased proportionately.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the following statement which appears in the Age of to-day—

The mail subsidy of £120,000 a year is not paid for visits to Sydney and Melbourne, but for the conveyance of letters from Great Britain to the most convenient ports of Australia, whence they can be circulated by rail and other means to all the States of the Union.

As a matter of fact, that statement is not correct.

Mr. MAHON.—It is correct.

Mr. CULPIN.—The new contract states that—

After the due delivery at Adelaide of all the mails intended to be delivered at that port, she shall continue her voyage to Melbourne and then to Sydney.

Mr. MAHON.—Nothing is charged for that continuance.

Mr. CULPIN.—By reason of that provision, I think it is only fair that Queensland should be considered in connexion with the new contract.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—As bearing upon the matter which has been called into question by the honorable member for Coolgardie, I wish to point out that, although the contract for the carriage of mails specifically terminates at Adelaide, it does not state that the Orient Company's tender was not materially increased by the insertion of the provision which requires the mail steamers to be fitted with refrigerating chambers for the carriage of Australian produce to the European market. No provision is made in that contract for the mail steamers continuing their voyage to Queensland, but it is expressly stipulated that they shall continue their voyage to Melbourne and Sydney. It is quite possible that had we omitted the conditions as to refrigerating machinery and cool chambers, we might have received a tender at a very much lower rate than we have at present to pay, and inasmuch as Queensland is being called upon to pay part of the subsidy to the Orient Company, I am at one with the honorable member for Brisbane in thinking that that State deserves some consideration in the shape of the extension of the service to the port of Brisbane.

Mr. WILKS.—On a point of order, sir, I should like to know what is the proper title by which you should be addressed when acting as Deputy-Speaker. Are we to address you as "Mr. Speaker," "Mr. Deputy-Speaker," or "Dr. Salmon"?

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER.—On a previous occasion when the honorable member raised this question, I expressed the opinion that the practice of addressing the Deputy-Speaker in the State House—with whose practice I was most familiar—was the correct one. I have since consulted Mr. Speaker and others, and have found that I was wrong, and that the occupant of the Chair should be addressed as Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I should like to say that, in my opinion, the statement in the Age to which reference has been made, is perfectly correct.

Mr. WILKINSON.—It is not.

Mr. MAHON.—Had the honorable member taken the trouble to read the advertisement inserted in the newspapers inviting tenders for the mail service, he would have known that it was specifically stated that the mails were to be carried from a British port to Adelaide. Subsequently, much to my surprise, the further condition was imposed that the steamers should continue their voyage from Adelaide to Melbourne and Sydney. So far as I can recollect, no such condition was embodied in the form of tender adopted by the Watson Government. The honorable member has made no attempt to show that the new condition has added one penny to the cost of the service, and until he is able to do so, it is wrong for him to question the press statement in question, or to put forward the preposterous claim that the Parliament is bound to subsidize these steamers to continue their voyage to a port to which they would not be justified in going by the present trading facilities. Not long ago the same claim was put forward on behalf of Queensland in a very impudent fashion by a State Minister, with whose statement I propose to deal when we are called upon to discuss the contract on the motion to be submitted by the Postmaster-General. Before resuming my seat, I should like to obtain a little information from the Minister respecting an arrangement that was made by his predecessor shortly after the Reid-McLean Administration came into office. I refer to the fact that, in order to assist the wealthy proprietors of the Melbourne morning newspapers to secure a very early distribution of their journals along the Ballarat and Bendigo line, it was arranged that an early clearance of letters should be made. The late Postmaster-General undertook to lay all the papers relating to that incident on the table of the House, but that promise has not been fulfilled. Possibly the honorable member is not much to blame, because those who objected to the system should have reminded him of his promise. I wish to know, however, whether the Postmaster-General at an early date will lay on the table, not merely the departmental papers, but all other information that can be obtained regarding this system, so that we may have an opportunity to consider it before the Estimates are dealt with.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat—Minister of External Affairs).—Any papers that the honorable member for Coolgardie requires in connexion with the matter referred to will be laid on the Library table before the Estimates are dealt with. By placing them on the Library table we shall prevent them from being impounded by the House.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 4.20 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 19 September, 1905.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITIONS.

Mr. KNOX presented a petition from certain residents of Kooyong, praying that stringent legislation be enacted to prohibit the importation of opium for smoking purposes into the Commonwealth.

Mr. CROUCH presented three similar petitions, two from white residents, and one from Chinese and Japanese residents of the Commonwealth.

Petitions received.

ORIENT MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the following report of a speech made by the Governor of South Australia:—

The only blot upon their prosperity was the way in which they saw, for a certain period of the year, mail steamers flying by this State, which had to be content with getting mails and cargoes second-hand from another State. He took a great interest in everything which would benefit South Australia, and while he could not take a prominent part officially, because the necessary action was not in the hands of the State Government, he did what he could to maintain the rights of South Australia in the matter, and to remove the great injustice done to this State. When he spoke to one in the highest authority in the Commonwealth, he was met with the answer that no public representation on the subject had been made by the people here on the subject. This loss of the mail steamers must not occur again, for if it did it would be fraught with the most serious consequences.

Mr. DEAKIN.—From what newspaper is that report taken?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The Adelaide Advertiser, of Monday last. The speech was made at the Commercial Travellers' dinner.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have read that report.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I wish to ask the honorable and learned gentleman if he does not consider that it is time that the Governor of South Australia was asked to remember his position, and to abstain from interfering in business other than that which he is supposed to transact on behalf of his State, and from making public statements, some of which are not merely inaccurate, but most unwarrantable and intolerable?

Mr. DEAKIN.—A gentleman present at that dinner has informed me, as he thought that my attention might be directed to the matter, that the newspaper report of His Excellency's speech conveys to readers an impression different from that received by his hearers. I understand that the Governor was referring to the inconvenience suffered by the State when, for a time, during the Reid-McLean administration, the Orient mail steamers ceased to call at Largs Bay.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The Governor of South Australia is always making partisan statements.

Mr. DEAKIN.—These remarks were addressed to a gathering of commercial travellers, and had relation to mercantile operations.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable and learned gentleman will sympathize with Queensland on this account.

Mr. DEAKIN. It seems impossible to deal with the circumstances of any one State without being supposed to sympathize with or differ from the views held by the people of some other State.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Will the Prime Minister make inquiries as to the truth of the statement of the Governor of South Australia that—

When he spoke to one in the highest authority in the Commonwealth, he was met with the answer that no public representation on the subject had been made by the people here on the subject?

The inference is that the interests of South Australia were not looked after by the representatives of that State in this House. Will the honorable and learned gentleman also ascertain whether the following statement is correct:—

He tried, at the time of the mail difficulty, to serve the interests of the State faithfully?

I should like to ascertain what steps the Governor of South Australia took in that matter.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I will have the records relating to the mail subsidy examined.

DEFENCE ACTS REGULATIONS.

Mr. PAGE.—In view of the statement of the honorable and learned member for Corio, which has not been denied, that Artillery rankers desirous of submitting themselves for examination for commissions are asked questions, by a special board of officers, about the social position and status of their families and relatives, will he request the Minister of Defence to see that similar questions are put to the officers now holding commissions?

Mr. DEAKIN.—I would rather that no such questions were put under any circumstances to any person.

METRIC SYSTEM.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

Whether the Government intend to introduce this session any legislation dealing with the weights and measures of the Commonwealth; and if not, whether any such proposals next session will include a provision for the adoption of the metric system by proclamation of the Executive, should that system be adopted by the Government of the United Kingdom?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

A Bill is being drafted on the subject, but it is doubtful whether it can be considered this session.

Probably in such Bill power will be taken to introduce the metric system when such a course may seem desirable.

COMMERCE BILL (No. 2).

In Committee (Consideration resumed from 15th September, vide page 2414):

Clause 3—

In this Act, unless the contrary intention appears—

“Officer” means an officer of Customs.

“Trade description,” in relation to any goods, means any description, statement, indication, or suggestion, direct or indirect—

- (a) as to the nature, number, quantity, quality, purity, class, grade, measure, gauge, size, or weight of the goods; or
- (b) as to the country or place in or at which the goods were made or produced; or
- (c) as to the manufacturer or producer of the goods or the person by whom they were selected, packed, or in any way prepared for the market; or

- (d) as to the mode of manufacturing, producing, selecting, packing, or otherwise preparing the goods; or
- (e) as to the material or ingredients of which the goods are composed, or from which they are derived; or
- (f) as to the goods being the subject of an existing patent, privilege, or copyright, and includes a Customs entry relating to goods; and any mark which, according to the custom of the trade or common repute, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters, shall be deemed to be a trade description within the meaning of this Act.

“False trade description” means a trade description which, by reason of anything contained therein or omitted therefrom, is false or likely to mislead in a material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied, and includes every alteration of a trade description, whether by way of addition, effacement, or otherwise, which makes the description false or likely to mislead in a material respect.

Upon which Mr. KNOX had moved by way of amendment—

That the words “a Customs entry relating to goods and,” lines 29 and 30, be left out.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—There are several amendments which I should like to move in an earlier part of the clause, and perhaps the honorable member for Kooyong will afford me an opportunity to do so. Honorable members will, I think, regard this as one of the most important clauses in the Bill, to which we should devote some attention. Since the circumstances are a little technical. It will be remembered that, among the objections taken to the Bill—to which I shall have to refer for the purpose of a few remarks with regard to the drafting of this clause—one was that it is a complete departure from the principle of English legislation; that, while in England the Act which prohibits the wrongful application to goods of trade marks and trade descriptions, simply penalizes those who use such marks fraudulently to pass off goods which are not of the character which they are represented to be, the Bill proposes to give power to the Minister to prescribe what description an importer or exporter shall place on his goods. Under the Bill the goods must be described according to methods of description prescribed by the Minister. In England the principle is that no description need be placed on goods, but that, if a description is placed on them, it must be a truthful one. There is great difference between the two positions. If a man is in any doubt as to what a particular description may mean; as to whether by using it, he may not be likely to mislead purchasers, and so bring himself within the penal sections of the Act, he need not place any description on his goods. In other words, he may abstain from trying to puff them, or from claiming special advantages for them, by allegations as to their nature or origin. But, under the Bill, an importer or exporter must, in every case, describe his goods according to the method prescribed by the Minister. This is so vital a difference in principle that we must be careful to see that we do not amplify our definition of trade description beyond that contained in the English Act, and, as I think I shall show, in the States Acts.

The CHAIRMAN.—Does the honorable member for Kooyong desire to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. KNOX.—Yes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GLYNN.—We must be very careful to narrow, within its clear necessities, the meaning of trade description. The Minister, so far from having done that, has most unreasonably and stupidly amplified it. It is a pity that, when the Bill was introduced, we were not given a definition of its provisions, which, while being, as it should have been, succinct, would also have been adequate and clear.

Mr. HIGGINS.—How does the honorable and learned member show that clause 3 compels the making of a statement as to what the goods are?

Mr. GLYNN.—Clause 3 alone does not do that. It defines a trade description, and is followed by other specific provisions. If the honorable and learned member refers to clause 7, he will understand the object which I have in view. I wish to show that the Bill differs vitally from the local and the English Acts, and that we should be careful not to amplify its definitions to increase the responsibility of those coming under it. The difference in principle to which I allude imposes a great responsibility on importers and exporters in Australia which is not imposed by the English Act, or the legislation of the States. I have complained that the Minister has not explained the provisions of the Bill with the clearness necessary for the proper understanding of it. It was not correct to say that this Bill was founded upon the Merchandise Marks of 1887. The Minister ought to have told us that while there was no departure in principle from English legislation—

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not state that there was no departure in principle from English legislation. I stated that the Bill was based partly upon English legislation.

Mr. GLYNN.—The only legislation referred to was the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I also referred to the Trade Marks Act.

Mr. GLYNN.—The Minister's remarks upon that point conveyed nothing. In the first place he should have explained the difference in principle, and should have informed us that instead of adhering to the uniform provision relating to "trade description" running through the several State Acts, which follow the English Act, a varying definition had been adopted. He should have explained, further, that apart from the difference in principle, the provision with regard to trade descriptions was, when coupled with the penal clauses of the Bill, much more drastic in its effect than that contained in the English Act. Whilst the English statute merely declares that a trade description, in relation to goods, should include particulars as to the number, quantity, measure, gauge, or weight of the goods, paragraph a of clause 3 requires that particulars should be given as to the nature, number, quantity, quality, purity, class, grade, measure, gauge, size, or weight. It is remarkable that the added terms are words the definition of which is exceedingly loose, and the connotation of which is particularly indefinite. Instead of using the clear and accurate words which appear in the English and States Acts, almost metaphysical terms of vague and nebulous meaning are employed. The words "nature" and "quality" are very wide and indefinite. Very much the same could be said with regard to "purity," and, in a minor degree, with regard to the words "class" and "grade." The only added word with any definite meaning is "size," and that happens to be superfluous, because all the information necessary may be called for under the terms "number," "quantity," and "measure." The Minister appears to have desired to use as many words as possible, whereas the best method of drafting is to be precise and concise. The fewer words used consistently with accuracy, the better, because the multiplicity of terms really leads to trouble in the Courts of justice. The definition given in the Bill is rendered dangerous by its tremendous expansion in substance through the addition of the words to which I have directed attention. If honorable members will look at paragraph b of clause 3, they will see that the draughtsman, following up the desire for novelty, is not content to leave the words as they stand in the English Act, but has transposed them, although the transposition has not effected any change in the meaning. In the English Act, the words "place or country" are used, whereas in the Bill the words are transposed. I do not see the object of that alteration, nor do I see that any useful purpose is served by the insertion of the words "or at," so as to make the paragraph read "as to the country or place in or at which the goods were made or produced." The new words do not grammatically fit in with the text, and, moreover, are superfluous. Paragraph c is an innovation—no such provision appears in the English or State Acts—which very closely approaches to the class of legislation sought to be introduced in connexion with the provision for the use of trade union labels. Information is to be supplied as to the manufacturer or producer of the goods or to the person by whom they were selected, packed, or prepared for market. I do not know why these words should have been inserted except as a corollary of the provision for the use of trade union labels. There have been other substantial additions to the provisions in the English and States legislation. Unless some clear and intelligent object is to be served we should aim at uniformity in legislation, and should follow as far as possible the terminology of Imperial legislation in regard to which a number of important decisions have been given during the last eighteen years. If we make our legislation uniform with that which has been in force in the United Kingdom we can secure a perfect application of Imperial decisions to our own Act. It is dangerous to depart from definitions which have been interpreted by the highest tribunal in the Empire. I have already mentioned that some of the State Acts deal with these very matters. Take the case of the South Australian Trade Marks Act of 1892. Part II. of that Act deals with the question of false and misleading trade descriptions, and follows exactly the terminology of the English Act. It seems to me that it is even more incumbent upon us to follow as far as we can the definitions adopted in local Acts than to adhere to the wording of the English statutes. The States Acts are still in force and as the Bill before us deals only with trade and commerce with foreign countries, we should have a series of provisions dealing with the marking of goods differing in principle as regards goods intended for export, and those intended for home consumption. This is a serious matter. Surely this Parliament, which was created to bring about uniformity, ought not, at this early stage of its career, to set itself to promote diversity of practice. I do not know what position manufacturers will find themselves placed in under varving legislation of this kind. Surely they will not mark their goods for local consumption in one way, and apply different descriptions to those which are intended for export. They cannot separate their products, because large manufacturers do not manufacture purely for export from Australia. If this provision were struck out, it would be a good thing for the Commonwealth. All that is desired, namely, to prevent the use of fraudulent trade marks would be accomplished under section 52 of the Customs Act, which enables the Minister to stop importations, or under the States Acts now in operation.

MR. HIGGINS.—Does the honorable and learned member find any conflict between the States laws and the provisions of the Bill?

MR. GLYNN.—Yes. I have sought to point out that a conflict does exist. The States Acts follow English legislation, and the English statute does not penalize a man for not describing his goods, but only for applying to them false descriptions. A merchant is free to send his goods out without any description, but if he decides to describe them his description must be true.

MR. HIGGINS.—But has the honorable and learned member been able to point to any inconsistency?

MR. GLYNN.—I have been endeavouring to do so. I am arguing from the provisions of the Bill.

MR. GROOM.—The honorable and learned member's argument is that we should so frame the Bill as to bring it into accord with the States laws.

Mr. GLYNN.—I say that it should not be passed at all, because it is not necessary. English legislation, which has accomplished everything required, has been embodied in the statutes of the States. I do not see why we should change the principles of English legislation, when there is no apparent necessity for so doing. If the Bill were passed a manufacturer would have to apply to all goods intended for export, the description prescribed in this measure, whereas, in order to comply with requirements in regard to goods intended for home consumption, he would have to refer to an entirely different set of laws. Besides, it would require all the ingenuity of a lawyer to discover beforehand whether a particular trade description was or was not misleading in some material particular.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Is the honorable and learned member's objection to clause 7?

Mr. GLYNN.—It goes to the root of the Bill. My object is to point out that in our definition of "trade description" we ought not to increase the risk of manufacturers incurring penalties by amplifying—where it really is unnecessary—the meaning of the words beyond the limit suggested by the Imperial Act of 1887 and the various States Acts dealing with this subject. Where the Minister has departed from the definition in the English Act he has very seriously increased the risks to persons engaged in external commerce. The use of the word "nature," the very first one in paragraph a, must have that effect. "Nature" is an abstract word which is exceedingly wide and indefinite. The Minister will make a man describe the nature of the goods that he is going to proclaim as coming within the meaning of this measure, and a merchant will have no option, in cases of doubt, but to apply a description and risk a prosecution. If it were not that I desire not to weary the Committee I could quote English decisions, reported in Kerly on Trade Marks, which show the difficulty that men experience in accurately describing their goods in relation to matters of quality or purity, which suggests the wisdom of the British Parliament in not making the definitions as wide—even where it is optional, as it is, under the English Act, to adopt them—as the Minister wishes to make them in this instance.

Mr. WILSON.—Having regard to the fact that the paragraph refers to the number, quality, and purity of the goods, is not the use of the word "nature" mere redundancy?

Mr. GLYNN.—I think it is. The honorable member's impression would be strengthened by a perusal of the English decisions on the shorter meaning of "trade description" as used in the Imperial Act. There are words introduced into this clause that will make "confusion worse founded." They are at best duplications of meaning, and have a certain redundancy that is always dangerous.

Mr. WILSON.—Would it not be better to move to omit the word "nature?"

Mr. GLYNN.—I propose to do so in order to test the principle of this definition. The more words that are added to one that is already clear and accurate, the more indefinite its meaning becomes. The Court assumes that the Legislature does not use many words to express in any particular provision that which is already expressed by one. Redundancy in debating often leads to nothing, but it is a particular vice in an Act of Parliament. I shall move to strike out the word "nature" in order that the definition may be limited to that given in the English Act of 1887 and in various States Acts. The Trade Marks Act of 1892 of South Australia gives definitions of "trade description" and "false trade description," which are identical with those in the English Act, and differ materially in substance from the one which we have now under consideration. In support of my assertion I shall not do more than refer honorable members to Part II. of that Act. If we did not pass this definition the Bill would be emasculated and rendered unnecessary, but everything that ought to be done would still be possible under the Customs Act, the Trade Marks Bill, and the local Acts of some of the States.

Mr. GROOM.—I do not think that all the States have adopted the English legislation on trade marks.

Mr. GLYNN.—It is open for them to do so. We do not wish to impinge on their province. If they have no desire to adopt such legislation for local purposes, it is a matter that concerns only themselves. We cannot touch them so far as local production and consumption are concerned; but any misdescription of imported goods can be dealt with by the Customs Act. That Act gives wide authority, and by availing ourselves of its provisions we can accomplish anything that reasonably ought to be done under a Bill of this kind.

Mr. McLEAN.—Is the object sought to be achieved by the use of the word "nature" expressed in any of the other words in the definition?

Mr. GLYNN.—I think not.

Mr. McLEAN.—Are there any words which express the nature of the commodity?

Mr. GLYNN.—I think that the provisions with regard to that are sufficient. If one gave a definition of the number, quantity, measure, gauge, size, or weight of the goods—

Mr. McLEAN.—That would not meet a case in which butter was described as oleomargarine.

Mr. GROOM.—Does the South Australian Act provide any penalty for so describing butter or vice versa?

Mr. GLYNN.—Most decidedly. Such a case would be covered by the provision in regard to a "false trade description," which is identical with that of the English Act.

Mr. GROOM.—But the "nature" of the goods is not mentioned.

Mr. GLYNN.—A "false trade description" means a trade description which is false in a material respect in regard to the goods to which it is applied. Surely if tar were described as butter, that would be a false description within the meaning of this clause, even if the word nature were omitted.

Mr. McLEAN.—What if a man were requested to describe his goods correctly? There is no other word in the definition clause dealing with the "nature" of an article.

Mr. GLYNN.—I recognise the point at which the honorable member is driving.

Mr. GROOM.—What objection can there be to requiring a man to tell the truth in regard to anything?

Mr. GLYNN.—The difficulty of saying it. If the Committee wish the word "nature" to remain, I shall refrain from moving the amendment, although its use might lead to difficulty of interpretation, inasmuch as it covers far more than is intended. It does not, however, touch the substance of my objection. It is inadvisable, unless absolutely necessary, to use words the scope of which is far greater than the necessities of a measure require. The point which the honorable member for Gippsland has in view is perfectly intelligible. If the Minister desired, goods would have to be described.

Mr. McLEAN.—And if a man described them at all, some word would have to be used showing what they actually were.

Mr. GLYNN.—I can appreciate the force of the honorable member's argument, and am not prepared to say off-hand that by a reference to the subsequent part of this clause his objection would be removed. I shall test the question by moving the omission of the word "quality." It refers to part of what is covered by the word "nature," and the proposal to strike it out will not be open to the objection suggested by the honorable member for Gippsland in regard to the omission of that word. I cannot say at present that the object sought to be accomplished by the use of the word "nature" is not attained by another part of the Bill, but in order to avoid any misunderstanding, I move—

That the word "quality," line 9, be left out.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY (Darwin).—I trust that the Committee will reject the amendment. If the honorable and learned member had suggested another word more forcible than "quality," I should not have objected to its omission, but he has wholly failed to indicate what we should insert in its place. My desire is to add the word "colour" to the definition. In order to show the Committee that legislators all over the world are passing measures designed to protect the people from commercial immorality, I wish to read quotations as to what is being done in Canada and the United States. Whenever Congress passes a measure that is not in harmony with the ideas of a certain section of the people of this country, some honorable members invariably refrain from referring to it, but when it suits their purpose they are always ready to point to the United States as "the great example." In the Age of the 15th inst. the following paragraph appears under the heading of "Trade and Finance":—

Attention is drawn to the fact that on the 1st of the present month the new regulations governing the importations of food products into the United States came into force. As the matter of dealing with Australian products is now under legislative consideration, it may be well to call attention to the action taken by the United States.

This is what is being done in the great republic—in the country where they have wooden hams and log nutmegs—

The new regulations referred to are intended to prevent the landing in the republic of any but pure food articles, and to put a stop to the continued importation of impure food, unless it is so distinctly marked that consumers cannot be deceived as to its real character. It is specified that all food products shall be designated by their usual names, and that when any foreign substance is added to them, other than necessary to their manufacture, the label shall bear a statement to that effect. If a food product has been artificially coloured, or a preserve has been added, these facts must appear on the label.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—That is what the honorable and learned member for Angas has been contending.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I do not say that the honorable and learned member has not a conscientious objection to the clause as it stands—

Should sugar, which is usually used in sweetening certain food products, be replaced by any other substance for that purpose, such as glucose, this fact must appear on the label. Where any essential ingredient of a food product is abstracted, and such abstraction is not necessary or usual in the preparation of the product, the label must indicate the ingredient which has been removed. For instance, if a portion of butter fat should be removed from milk, such removal is to be noted in the label. All descriptive matter must be printed in the English language, and in all food products packed and shipped after 1st September, the descriptive matter will be required as a part of the original label. The regulations have been indorsed by traders, who admit that the desire to insure cheapness in food requisites has opened the door for the admission of adulterated articles that should not be permitted to go into consumption. The policy of stopping the sale of "make believes," by insisting that the contents should be shown on the package is an advance; add contents, weight or length, and then we shall get honest trade.

Almost every country with which we have to compete is imposing strict regulations, making it impossible for men to become millionaires through chicanery and fraud. How can Australia hope to compete in the markets of the world if we have a lower standard of commercial morality than have other countries? Think of the fact that Australia of all countries that sent products to South Africa during the war was the principal offender in reference to short weight.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Short weight in what article?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Think of the fact that the experts of the British Army will not allow Australian leather to be used. Is Australia to be the only country that is afraid to tackle the problem for fear of losing a little business? I am glad that the Ministry has had the pluck to bring down this Bill. I hope to see it carried.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I wish they had the brains to understand it.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY. — They have the brains to understand it, and we have the brains to assist them to have it enacted. Nearly every advance that has been made in the world has been opposed by those who have benefited from the system sought to be improved. That had been the case in science, in literature, and in every department. The lineal ancestors of those who are opposing this Bill were the upholders of slavery, polygamy, and other things that are now regarded with horror.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney). —The contention of the honorable member for Darwin with reference to the United States Act is not at variance with what honorable members on this side of the chamber have been trying to get in this Bill. So far as I can make out from his reference to American legislation, it calls upon people who put in their goods ingredients which are not ordinarily used in such commodities to affix a label stating what is contained in them. That is precisely what the honorable and learned member for Angas contended should be done in this Bill. Ministers have never explained what the clause under consideration and clause 7, which is the crux of the Bill, are intended to do. It seems to me that they are taking powers which, if exercised to the full limit, would control the whole of our commerce, and would be in conflict with several of our States Acts referring to internal trade. I am a supporter of this Bill. I voted for its second reading. Its main provisions are such as any one who desires to see commerce conducted honestly must wish to see adopted. But power is given to do such a wide diversity of things that we do not know where the Executive will stop in compelling people to submit to regulations and to the whole paraphernalia of inspection. I have had some experience of what inspection means, and I say that this is one of the most dangerous powers that can be given to any Government. It enables inspectors to issue their fiat as to whether goods are to be exported as first, second, or third grade; in fact, as to whether they are to be shipped abroad with a chance of their bringing so much more or less money to the exporter. It is this dangerous power that I contend against. I wanted to pin the honorable member for Darwin to what I think was really in his mind when he spoke of the short weight of Australian goods exported to South Africa during the war. I think he intended to refer to the jam trade. I wish to say that Australian jams were never sent to South Africa short weight. The packages were sold at the weight they contained. That fact has been brought out in the House of Commons, and Australian exporters have been completely exonerated from any attempt to "get at" the War Office or the general public. Coming from an honorable member who complains so much about the "stinking fish" cry, his reference to this subject was remarkable.

Mr. SPENCE.—Short weight butter was exported.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I cannot speak with regard to butter, but certainly the exporters of jam were paid for net weight, no matter what was contained in the tins. The packages were used by the Army in whatever way they thought fit, but there was no misrepresentation in regard to the weight of goods purchased. As to leather, I cannot speak so positively, but from what I have heard, I am quite prepared to believe that Australian leather is as good as any leather made in the world. It may be true that some leather is adulterated here as it is in other parts of the world, and it is for us to determine whether we shall call upon the manufacturers or exporters to say whether their leather contains any foreign ingredients. I am quite prepared to give the Government power to do that. But I am not prepared to pass this clause as it stands, though I cannot see exactly how to move in the direction of amending it. The clause would subject exporters and manufacturers to the prospect of being black-mailed at the instance of a staff of officials, whose word would have to be obtained as to the quality of the goods before they could be shipped. It is a fair thing to say that if a man exports leather which contains foreign ingredients, he shall declare what those ingredients are. But if the article is leather pure and simple, no Government should interfere to decide what the quality is. It would be sufficient to keep up the Australian good name if we put a bar to adulteration which might bring our trade into contempt. But I guarantee that if this Bill passes in its present form, before it has been in operation two years the whole commercial world of Australia will be up in arms against it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—I hope the Committee will not pass the amendment. The word "quality," to my mind, is of great and grave importance. Even in regard to leather, which has been mentioned by the honorable member who has just resumed his seat, I know that the quality for certain purposes has been materially reduced by the application of certain chemical substances. Not only leather, but a variety of other products may be rendered inferior in quality by the use of adulterants.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—But if the leather is pure, would the honorable gentleman allow the Government to step in and designate its quality?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If it is known to be inferior leather, it should be so marked.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—But under this Bill goods will be graded.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member appears to be afraid of the word "grade." Honorable members opposite have been using it in a ridiculous manner. They know perfectly well what is intended. I will read what is done in Victoria, where grading takes place just as much as could be the case under this Bill. This is the way in which goods are graded in this State:—

Compulsory inspection under this Act takes place with regard to butter and cheese intended for export, and in regard to live stock and produce liable to carry any disease, such, for instance, as meat. The compulsory supervision with regard to the latter, however, extends only to inspection as to freedom from disease. Butter, after inspection, is marked either "approved for export" or "fit for pastry."

Those words "approved for export" are always contained in the Victorian Act.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That is a grading Act.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It applies to quality.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If that is done it is grading.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — Honorable members opposite may call it what they like. They have been trying to make out that the object of this Bill is to apply to goods such terms as "Grade 1," "Grade 2," "Grade 3," "Grade 4," and so on. But they know perfectly well that there is no intention to do anything of the kind at present.

Mr. WILSON.—If power is taken to do it under this Bill what is to prevent its being done?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It may be necessary, in some cases, to mark goods with a statement of their quality. But, to show the misconceptions that have arisen, take the case of apples. Some gentlemen connected with the trade came to see me. They had seen a copy of the Bill, and took fright because the words "quality" and "weight" were used in certain clauses. They thought that in future apples would have to be sold by weight instead of by the bushel. I pointed out that there was no intention to do anything of the kind, but that the object was, amongst other things, to fix the size of the case—to impose a standard for selling purposes.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—There is no power in this Bill to do that.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; the word "size" is used.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That does not enable the Government to fix any size of case.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If exporters do not agree to the size fixed, we can deal with them; but there is no doubt that they will do so.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I say there is no power in the Bill to fix a size for cases.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I differ from the honorable member.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member for North Sydney should read clause 10 in conjunction with the clause under consideration.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I told the honorable member on Friday that he was wrong. It is absolutely necessary to retain the word "quality." I have listened to the remarks of the honorable and learned member for Angas with a great deal of pleasure, as I always do, because they are always closely reasoned from his standpoint. I think, however, that the honorable and learned member is absolutely wrong in his view that we ought to adhere altogether to the wording of the English Merchandise Marks Act and the Acts of the various States. In Victoria, and I believe also in South Australia, there are Acts dealing with questions of this kind, but I am not sure that such legislation has been passed in any of the other States. Whatever we do must be applicable to the whole of Australia; and one of the objects of this Bill is to secure uniformity. It is always better to have matters of this kind made certain and, although, as one honorable member has said, the object may be achieved by the definition of another word, it may, on the other hand, not be covered. We ought to let the public and the commercial people know exactly what we mean. The word "quality" was in the Bill as originally drafted or prepared by my friend the honorable member for Gippsland.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member for Gippsland has stated distinctly that the Bill was not prepared by him—that he had never seen it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I understood that the honorable member for Gippsland had seen the Bill, and had given directions to have it prepared.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member for Gippsland said that he had never revised the Bill.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That may be, but the honorable member for Gippsland gave directions to have the Bill prepared, I understand, under certain conditions; he may not have revised it in detail.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member for Gippsland said he had never altered the Bill.

Mr. WILSON.—The honorable member for Gippsland certainly said that he had never revised the Bill.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That may be so.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Then why should the present Minister of Trade and Customs take shelter under a statement of the kind?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Bill was drafted according to the ideas of those to whom the honorable member for Gippsland gave instructions.

Mr. ROBINSON.—And those are the same officers who are now advising the Minister of Trade and Customs.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Not, perhaps, the same officers. The word "purity" is not in the Merchandise Marks Acts, or any of the Acts of the States; and it has been deliberately inserted in the present measure, after discussion between the officers of the Department and myself, because it is felt that without it there will be a great weakness in regard to wine and other liquid commodities. There are other words which have been inserted for a similar reason. The honorable and learned member for Angas has the candour to admit that he would prefer to see the Bill rejected altogether; and, therefore, while his criticism may be directed to framing the Bill as nearly as possible in the shape in which he would like to see it, we cannot forget that he has no friendly feeling towards it, and would like to see it rendered useless by allowing it to go no further than the present legislation. I hope the Committee will reject the amendment, because the definition has been thought out, and is directed to meet all cases. The great object of the Bill is to insure that foodstuffs, especially those which come in or go out of Australia, shall be pure—that every commodity shall be what it is represented to be. If a commodity is marked, and is bought with a mark upon it, that is the business of the purchaser; the object of the Government in introducing the measure is to secure that the public shall know what they are buying.

Mr. WILSON.—Will the Minister apply the Bill to foodstuffs only?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No. I have, however, stated that I intend to submit an amendment.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—What is the amendment?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I indicated roughly what the proposed amendment is, and when we get further on with the Bill I shall be as good as my word. I know that many honorable members think the measure ought to apply to all goods, and, after what I saw the other day in connexion with boot manufacture, I am inclined to think that something should be done to stop the iniquity there disclosed.

Mr. WILSON.—This Bill would not affect such boots.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not reply fully the other afternoon because honorable members were then in a hurry to catch trains, and I should like now to say that I am uncertain whether it would not be a good thing to apply this Bill to goods as between State and State, as well as to foreign goods. When we make further progress with the measure, I think it may be possible for some consideration to be given to that aspect of the case.

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon).—There appears to be some misapprehension as to the practice in Victoria. The Victorian Act, dealing with exports, was passed in the year 1898, and there was much discussion in the State Parliament on the principle of grading. Finally, Parliament decided that all butter, for instance, of a reasonably good quality should be marked "approved for export," butter of inferior quality being marked "pastry"; the only prohibition on export from Victoria was that of commodities not fit for human consumption. A suggested provision for dividing produce into various grades was persistently brought forward by the departmental officers, but was not inserted in the Bill. In 1901, an amending Bill was introduced into the State Parliament, and the departmental officers once more sought to have Victorian exports graded, but again Parliament refused to pass such a provision into law.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Owing to the opposition of the Legislative Council.

Mr. ROBINSON.—And also owing to strong opposition from a number of producers.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The provision was passed by a large majority in the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. ROBINSON.—When I was in the Victorian Legislative Assembly the Opposition was led by one of the best dairymen in Victoria, who is at the present time a member of the State Parliament. In the Legislative Council the grading principle was objected to by a member who was at that time, and is now, I believe, one of the largest dairy farmers in the State. These facts show that the principle of grading was not accepted in Victoria, and that the only prohibition assented to was in relation to produce unfit for human consumption. Regarding the question from its lowest stand-point, what is the good of a man exporting produce and branding it as of inferior quality? We have heard a good deal lately of "the stinking fish" policy, which would seem to be that adopted by the present Ministry. Buyers in London do not buy on the Government brand, but on the quality of the goods.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am informed quite differently.

Mr. ROBINSON.—If the Government brand goods as inferior, that only provides an excuse for the buyer to beat down the price, whereas goods, when not branded, have to stand on their merits.

Mr. HIGGINS.—In the States of America there are Government brands.

Mr. ROBINSON.—But how are we to get uniform grading from one end of Australia to the other? Are we to assume that departmental officers will all grade in exactly the same way? We need only ask the question to show the unreasonableness of the proposal.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—There might be contradictory grading between the States and the Commonwealth.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That is so; and the more one looks into the question the more difficult it appears. It has been repeatedly pointed out that this Bill would not cover the shocking examples which the honorable member for Darling laid before honorable members the other night.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think it will be found that the Bill does cover such cases.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The Bill applies only to goods exported from Australia, and the honorable member for Darling was referring to produce which is exchanged between the States, and which, as I say, would not be affected by the Bill in the slightest degree.

Mr. CHANTER.—The Bill would prevent the passage of goods which were not properly described.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It would not even do that. All the Bill provides is that, if goods are branded with a true description they shall be allowed to enter, but not otherwise. The honorable member for Darling gave instances of goods of local production sent from Melbourne to other parts of the Commonwealth; and that could not be prevented by the Bill. In this regard, the measure will give a premium to an industry of the kind referred to by the honorable member for Darling—an industry which ought to be discouraged. I hope the Committee will not accept the grading principle, seeing that the bulk of the producers do not desire it.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is not the issue now.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The whole question hinges on that issue. Strong representations were made to me when I was a member of the Victorian Parliament against the adoption of the grading principle, and similar representations have been made to me during the past few months.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby).—I understand that the honorable and learned member for Angas proposes that the Committee should eliminate the word "quality," not because he particularly objects to that word, but in order to test the question whether there shall be any provision whatever as to the grading or branding of goods for export—whether there shall be any Government regulation. Personally, I am in somewhat of a difficulty as to how to vote until I know exactly what the Government propose. The intentions of the Government, and the amendments which it is proposed to submit, ought to be within the knowledge of honorable members before any vote is taken. Otherwise, I shall vote for the inclusion of the word; because we should then be free to recommit the Bill and strike it out, if necessary. It would, however, materially assist the Committee if, in dealing with a matter of this magnitude, we knew exactly what steps the Government proposed to take.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—We are at present working in the dark.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—To a certain extent that is so. At present there is no Department to deal with matters of the sort under discussion; and we are entitled to know to what extent it is proposed to have Government inspection. I am in entire agreement with any proposal for classifying, if necessary, goods imported for human consumption, and for the accurate description of other commodities, so that the public may not purchase them in ignorance of their contents or quality. Of course, when we have to deal with exports, it must be made clear that we do not put into the hands of Customs officials a power practically to retard production in Australia. That might follow if those employed in this duty were not thoroughly qualified for the work. Under the Bill, an "officer" means an "officer of Customs." I suppose that if an expert were appointed, he would be made an officer of Customs, but certainly every Customs officer could not be intrusted with a very great deal of this work.

Mr. GROOM.—The expert would be under the Customs Department.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—There would be no difficulty in making him an officer of the Customs Department. What I mean to say is that it is essential that any man appointed to grade the quality and test the purity of goods, should be an expert. Butter, meat, wine, and fruit are, I suppose, the leading lines of exports to which the provisions of such a Bill as this would apply. No ordinary Customs official, unless he has had very large practical experience and possesses some amount of scientific knowledge, is qualified to grade these commodities. The grading of wine requires expert knowledge of a very special character. In South Australia, we intrusted the rejection of certain wines and the granting of certificates of purity and soundness in respect of wines to Professor Perkins, a man whose qualifications in this respect are second to those of no other man in Australia.

Mr. FISHER.—What salary was he paid?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I think he reached a salary of £800 a year.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Does he grade or does he say that one article is pure and that another is not pure?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—He does not really grade. I think that he deals with only two classes, but honorable members will see that that requires quite as much expert knowledge as grading, because there is so much wine on the border line. Whether an officer has to grade into two or four classes, there is a border line in each case, and it is that which constitutes the difficulty. I gather from the remarks of the Minister that the question of uniform packing cases can be provided for under this Bill.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—There is no power under this Bill to provide for that.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It seems to me that there is. I shall not discuss the question, but honorable members who are better qualified than I am to interpret its provisions express the opinion that that power is undoubtedly contained in the measure. It seems to me that this clause, taken in conjunction with clause 10, gives that power. I should like to point out that while, in the opinion of fruit-growers, certain packing cases are best for the export of fruit to Europe, the fruit trade with the East requires a different method of packing, and requires a case in which there is a centre-piece. All these things must be taken into account, and the Government Department intrusted with the administration of this measure must be very careful not to hamper the trade of the Commonwealth.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The fruit trade with Northern Queensland will require cases made of the timber which can be got there.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is so. In South Australia, we grow no timber suitable for making packing cases. In some of the States, of course, the local timber is used for their manufacture. In some instances the outside dimensions of the cases will be governed by the materials used in their manufacture, but that is not a very serious consideration, because what will be insisted upon under Government inspection will be the capacity of the cases and not their outside measurement. The honorable member for South Sydney, when speaking about the War Office contracts for goods sent to South Africa, contended that Australia had come very well out of the discussion which took place in connexion with those contracts, inasmuch as it was proved that the bulk quantity of the goods sent was in every case as specified. From my own observation, I am able to inform the honorable member that, in one case, at all events, a shortage would have been exported but for Government inspection. I shall not be any more definite, but honorable members may take my word for it that it was only because inspection by a Government officer was a condition laid down by the War Office that a shortage was discovered in the case of certain goods sent from one of the States.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Was that in South Australia?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It was in connexion with certain contracts for goods sent to South Africa.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It was not in New South Wales.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not know whether there was any inspection of goods supplied under those contracts in New South Wales.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Yes, there was.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is probable that a knowledge of the fact that the goods would have to pass a Government inspector was an incentive to those supplying the goods to see that they were full weight.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The contracts were for net weight.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The goods had to be put up in certain-sized tins, as a rule. But in one case which came under my own observation the tins were not of the weight which they were stated to be, and but for Government inspection the net weight exported would have been short.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I exported goods under those contracts, and I know I was paid for what I delivered.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I am not referring to any goods exported by the honorable member. Inspection as to quantity and quality might be a splendid thing for the reputation of Australia, and of great advantage to Australian producers if it is carefully and efficiently carried out. But it is really important that we should know to what goods this measure will apply. The Government should, as far as possible, have the details of their proposal worked out, and they should take the Committee into their fullest confidence in respect to them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — They are afraid that a little knowledge would be fatal to the measure.

Mr. BATCHELOR. — I do not think that the honorable member believes that. A little knowledge is better than none. I am sincerely anxious to assist the Government to pass a measure which will serve the purpose for which this Bill has been introduced. At the same time, I entirely agree with those who say that we should have very full information as to what the Government really propose to do before we are asked to give them such powers as are provided for in this measure. I can quite conceive the possibility of the export trade of some of the States being hampered by over officialism. We should know really what the Government propose under the measure before we consent to give them these very large powers.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—It is refreshing to honorable members on this side to listen to so thoughtful a speech from the other side as that delivered by the honorable member for Boothby. All those who have made certain representations from this side agree entirely with what the honorable member has said. The consideration of the Bill is surrounded with difficulties, largely due to a want of knowledge as to how it will be practically applied. Men who from day to day are, throughout this Commonwealth, in constant contact with the exportation and importation of goods of all kinds hold the view that this measure is calculated to hamper trade. The honorable member for Boothby desires that no measure passed by this House shall have such an effect. The Minister is aware, from representations made to him by the Chambers of Commerce that the exporters and importers of the Commonwealth are entirely in favour of every clause and line in this Bill which will have the effect of preventing fraudulent representation in commerce and trade. It is because it is felt that this measure will not accomplish that object, but will have the effect of unnecessarily hampering trade, and will involve enormous expenditure if its provisions are to be satisfactorily applied, that so much resistance is offered to it. I would suggest that at this stage the Minister should take the Committee into his confidence, and let honorable members know his decision in the matter so far as it was communicated to the Chambers of Commerce. The honorable gentleman explained that clause 7 was not to apply to goods other than articles intended for human consumption, and medicines and medicinal preparations recommended as beneficial for any portion of the human or animal body. So far as the measure will apply to these goods, we all desire to assist the Government in making it as effective as possible.

Mr. TUDOR.—Why not apply it to articles of wearing apparel?

Mr. KNOX.—I have quoted the opinion of the Minister. It was explained to the honorable gentleman at the time that that took the sting out of the measure, but that in various other directions it was impossible to apply the Bill practically.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—According to what is now being said, my statement does not appear to have taken the sting out of the measure very much.

Mr. KNOX.—We have had no definite statement that the Minister is prepared to come down with the proposed amendment. I am sure that the honorable gentleman intends to do so when we reach clause 7.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I told the honorable member that I intended to fulfil my promise.

Mr. KNOX.—Honorable members do not understand precisely what it is the Minister proposes to do. I feel that the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Angas re-opens the whole discussion on the principle underlying the Bill. The opposition to the measure arises from the belief that it will hamper trade and commerce to the detriment of the Commonwealth. So far as it will prevent fraud and misrepresentation in trade and commerce it will receive general support, and the Minister may be perfectly sure that every honorable member on this side will support any clause calculated to have that effect. But we have made representations which are based on practical experience, and they have not been made for the purpose merely of obstruction. We have every desire to make the Bill a workable measure, and it has therefore been very gratifying to us to hear the speech made by the honorable member for Boothby. It is clear that there are supporters of the measure who believe that its application requires very serious consideration. I believe that the honorable and learned member for Angas does not attach too great importance to the meaning of the word "quality." The honorable and learned gentleman has simply shown that in its present shape the Bill is unworkable, and may do harm. We, therefore, ask the Committee to re-consider it, and our views in regard to it could not have been better stated than they have been by the honorable member for Boothby.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moira).—It appears to me that those opposed to this proposal argue on the assumption that the Minister and officers administering this Bill will leave nothing whatever undone to hamper trade.

Mr. KNOX.—We have had some experience of the administration of the Customs Act.

Mr. KENNEDY. — I take a view which is quite contrary to that of the honorable member, and I hold this view because of what I know of the supervision of exports in Victoria by State officials. Notwithstanding what the honorable and learned member for Wannon has said with regard to the intentions of the Victorian Parliament when a certain measure was before it, more particularly as to one article of export, the indirect effect of that legislation has been good, a considerable improvement in the quality of that one article being one of its results. I do not believe for a moment that where business is conducted on fair lines, and the goods which are imported or exported are what they are represented to be, there will be any interference on the part of the Customs Department; but I hope that whenever dishonest practices occur in regard to either importation or exportation, to the detriment of the honest trader, the Minister will require the affixing of true descriptions to the goods concerned. By way of illustration I ask, should not the Customs Department be able to require an importer, after reasonable notice has been given to him, not to import as woollen goods what is really shoddy, or to import as linen what is cotton?—a fraud the existence of which was proved in our Courts a short time ago.

Mr. MALONEY.—Very respectable men were connected with it, too.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No fault may attach to those in the trade; but the public must be protected, and importers should be asked to clearly and distinctly describe the nature of their goods, and should be made responsible for their descriptions. With regard to what has been said about grading, I do not believe that there is any danger of any hampering restriction being placed upon either the importer or the exporter. I am not alarmed about the possibility of an undue interference with our export trade in meat, butter, or fruit.

Mr. FISHER.—Is there an inspector of meat connected with the export trade of Victoria?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes.

Mr. FISHER.—We have had such officers in Queensland for ten years.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is a pity that the first shipments of meat sent from here were not inspected, because the action of some of the exporters was such as to ruin our reputation for a time, so that it is only recently that we have recovered lost ground. The Minister is empowered under the Bill, not to restrict or hamper importation or exportation, but to assist honest traders. Every Act of Parliament imposes restrictions on the individual; but it is not intended to interfere with honest traders. The object of this measure is to prevent honest traders from being injured by the unfair competition of dishonest traders. In my opinion, if the amendment be agreed to, the efficacy of the Bill will be impaired.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney).—It ought not to be necessary to assure honorable members, as has been done so often already, that underlying the opposition to various provisions of the Bill there is no desire to protect dishonest traders, though there is a desire to see that goods which bear a description are truthfully described, whether they be imported goods or goods for export. I wish to point out that the Bill does not profess to accomplish some of those things which honorable members think it will accomplish; and, further, that it will not successfully accomplish some of the objects aimed at. For instance, there is nothing to prevent the use of deleterious, injurious, or adulterated articles once they have been imported. The card-board which was exhibited here by the honorable member for Darling on Friday last can still be imported under a proper description, and used locally in the making of boots.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That can be prevented.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not see how it can be prevented by the Bill if the manufactured article is not exported from the State in which it is made. I think, however, that we can deal with Inter-State trade.

Mr. GLYNN.—I doubt if the provisions of the Bill can be applied to Inter-State trade, because of the prohibition in section 92 of the Constitution against interference with the freedom of trade between the States.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I would not question the honorable and learned member's legal opinion, but, as a layman, I am inclined to think that we can deal with Inter-State trade. We cannot, however, deal with the manufacture and sale of goods within any State. Card-board could be imported under its proper description, if the Bill were in force, and made into boots which could be sold within the State as manufactures of leather without interference by the Commonwealth Government. Several honorable members, however, argue that the Commonwealth Government can prevent such transactions. Those who are supporting the amendment do not object to true descriptions of goods being required.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Would the honorable member compel the placing of descriptions on all goods?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I do not object to a description being insisted on where that is necessary to prevent fraud, but I do not wish for insistence upon unnecessary descriptions. The Bill gives the Minister power to insist on, not merely true descriptions, but any descriptions which he or his officers may choose to impose. There may be no mis-description, the truth of the description being admitted by the Department, and yet the Minister may insist upon some other description as well. That is a very wide power to give to the Minister. I agree with the honorable member for Boothby that we should know to what goods it is intended to apply the provisions of the measure, as the desirability of certain provisions in the Bill will be much affected by that. It is time that the Committee had an intimation from the Minister as to the limitations which he will impose. The Minister stated that he would fix a certain size for fruit cases.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—A size which would be recognised by the Department as the proper size.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The proper size to hold certain quantities. I interjected that the Bill gave no power for that. The honorable member for Boothby very properly urged that it would be very undesirable to fix one size only, because different sizes may be required for different destinations.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If another size were used, it would have to be specifically branded.

Mr. FISHER.—The various sizes should bear a certain proportion one to another.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Even supposing that it were desirable, the Minister would not be empowered to fix the sizes of the cases.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There is nothing to prevent a man using any kind of case, so long as it is properly marked.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I contend that no power is conferred to fix the size of the cases used for packing goods for export. A man may send in a case containing 1 cwt. or 2 cwt., so long as he marks it accurately. The Minister may require that the case shall be accurately marked, but he cannot fix the size of the case to be used.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—We shall fix certain standard sizes, and if cases of other sizes are used, they will have to be marked accurately.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The standard cases will also have to be marked.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Not necessarily.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am merely pointing out that there is a great deal of misapprehension with regard to the measure, and that some further information is due to honorable members. I do not attach to the word "quality" the importance indicated by the honorable and learned member for Angas. I merely look upon his amendment as a test of the question of grading by the Commonwealth. I am certainly opposed to grading being done by the Commonwealth authorities, until arrangements have been made with the States for suspending their operations in that direction. It would be absurd to have two grading systems in operation at the same time. Not only would it lead to duplication, but also to confusion and dissatisfaction, owing to the differences of opinion which might exist between the graders of the Commonwealth and those of the States. We should be told clearly how the Minister intends to classify goods intended for export. Does he intend to follow the Victorian example, and grade butter as "approved for export," or as "pastry." I gather that he does, and, if so, we shall at once have a duplication of grading.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Commonwealth Act will take precedence of all other Acts.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Still, I think it undesirable that we should, without entering into some understanding with the States authorities, undertake work which is already being performed by the States.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—All the States do not at present grade and mark goods for export.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But some of them do, and the Minister has not informed us whether he intends to exercise the powers conferred under the Bill in all the States, or whether he intends to accept as sufficient the grading which is now being carried on in some of the States. We are being asked to commit ourselves to a large expenditure, without any explanation from the Minister as to how far he intends to exercise the powers proposed to be conferred on him. The Victorian Act is perfectly clear. It is free from the uncertainty that attaches to the provisions of the Bill. In view of the very wide powers which are proposed to be conferred, and of the fact that the system which is to be established under the Bill is already in operation to a large extent in several of the States, we should proceed with the utmost caution.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—The honorable member has questioned me so repeatedly upon the question of grading, that I hardly understand what he means.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We do not know what the Minister means.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member has no desire to understand. He knows well what is intended. I think that the honorable member for Boothby will admit that it is impossible for me, before the measure is passed, to go into particulars as to how the whole of the detail work will be carried out under it. I shall not attempt to do anything of the kind.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Very much will depend upon the regulations.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Exactly. A great deal of the work performed in Victoria is carried out under regulations. What the Committee are asked to do is to approve of the main principles of the Bill, and to leave matters of detail to be dealt with by regulation. Honorable members cannot expect that before the Bill is passed

I shall instruct my officers to consult the authorities of the various States as to how grading shall be carried out, and also to confer with certain business men with regard to the trade descriptions and marks to be used.

Mr. POYNTON.—Surely the Minister can tell us whether it is intended to duplicate the arrangements of the States?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is intended that the Commonwealth shall deal with the matter after consultation with those States in which provision is made for the inspection and classification of goods intended for export. An endeavour will be made to arrange matters amicably.

Mr. WEBSTER.—In cases where the States Acts are operating successfully they will not be interfered with.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I should not like to say that; but probably the States officers who are now carrying out the work for the States will act for the Commonwealth much in the same way that they are doing at present in other departments. It is not intended that there shall be any undue interference in cases where they have adopted satisfactory methods, but only that amicable arrangements shall be made. There is no desire to unduly interfere with the States methods, although Commonwealth legislation must, of course, supersede that of the States. I have here a statement with regard to what is being done in Victoria in this direction. I have previously read a portion of the memorandum, which proceeds as follows:—

Grading is carried out by the Department when requested by shippers, but is not compulsory. With regard to butter, the desirability of submitting to Departmental grading is being widely recognised.

When I was at Albury show a few days ago a number of persons interested in this trade told me that the desire to have the Victorian Government brand placed upon their goods was becoming universal, and that a great many persons in New South Wales were now sending produce for long distances through to Melbourne, in order that the Government brand might be affixed to their goods. The butter exported from Sydney is not graded by Government officials. I am not sure that some butter is not sent from localities near Sydney to be graded and exported from Melbourne. The statement from which I have been reading proceeds—

Two years ago, 22 butter factories submitted voluntarily to grading; last season there were 67, and it is expected that before very long all those factories doing any export trade will come in. When this takes place, the intention of the Department is to have all butters approved for export graded first, second, or third grade, and those not coming within any of the grades will be marked "pastry." At present very little "pastry" butter is exported. The voluntary submission for grading, of other products, is also largely increasing. The Department grades and marks as follows:—

Mutton and lamb: prime, good, and plain. In each of these qualities there are the following distinctions of weight:—

"A"	...	28 to 35 lbs.
"B"	...	36 to 42 lbs.
"H"	...	Over 42 lbs.
"L"	...	Under 28 lbs.

Only a few shipments were graded last year, but the number submitted to the Department is increasing.

Rabbits are branded in Black, signifying "best," and in Red, signifying "seconds," and words "second grade."

Each quality is divided according to weight, into—

"Large"	...	Over 2½ lbs.
"Young"	...	2 to 2½ lbs.
"Small"	...	1½ to 2 lbs.

But in "seconds," instead of "large," &c., they are numbered size 1, 2, or 3. Practically all the rabbits exported are inspected and graded.

That indicates what is being done in Victoria. I need not weary honorable members by reading any further, but the memorandum goes on to deal with vegetable products, poultry, and other articles, and tends to show that the desire to have the Government mark affixed to produce is rapidly extending. I have been asked to say what new provision I propose to submit by way of restricting the operation of the Bill. I told the deputation from the Chamber of Commerce that my desire in the first instance was to deal mainly with produce, food-stuffs, and medicines. I have since thought over the question whether apparel shall not be brought within the scope of the Bill. I want to be fair to all concerned, and I propose to submit an amendment somewhat in this form—

Sections 7 and 10 shall apply only to articles for human consumption, or goods used in the manufacture of articles for human consumption, medicines, and medicinal preparations—and I think I shall add the words "apparel and manures."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What would be left out?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—A great many things. I do not pledge myself to the exact words. I have been endeavouring to ascertain the exact technical meaning of the word "apparel," but I have not yet obtained a very clear definition. I think, however, that, without extending the scope of the Bill to every article of merchandise, something should be done to put a stop to the practices followed by some manufacturers, such as were indicated by the honorable member for Darling in connexion with boots and shoes, and the materials used in their manufacture. There is no desire, so far as I am concerned, to unduly restrict trade. Other Ministers may act differently, but I do not intend to unduly hamper or restrict trade. It is my desire to prevent the introduction of spurious articles such as are being imported into the Commonwealth, and are involving great destruction of human life. I refer particularly to infant foods.

Mr. MALONEY.—And clothing.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—My remarks do not apply to clothing to the same degree. I also wish to inform the honorable member for Boothby that when the Bill becomes law it is intended to consult persons interested in the export trade as to the proper trade descriptions to be adopted. We shall meet them in every possible way, and interfere as little as possible with what has been done in the past. We shall exercise the powers conferred upon us under the Bill, only in cases where dishonest practices have been indulged in. I have nothing more to add. I have sought to meet all the objections that have been advanced, and wish the Committee to clearly understand that it would be foolish at this stage, before the Bill has actually come into operation, to endeavour to go into every little detail to be dealt with under it. All that I can do at the present stage is to state generally what is the object which the Department seeks to carry out.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I have listened to the Minister with a great deal of interest, but confess that he has given us no further information, except as to one point. I think that he succeeded in making it exceedingly clear that he is not going to allow whatever exemption he promised the Chambers of Commerce.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister told us that he proposed to limit the operation of the Bill to all foodstuffs for human consumption, to medicine, and to apparel, or, in other words, to all that people consume in the way of goods, plus medicine, and to all that they wear. I should like to know what will be omitted.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—A number of things—all piece goods, for example.

Mr. MALONEY.—We should omit nothing.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I can quite understand the honorable member for Melbourne approving of this. He knows what scope the Minister intends this provision to have. If he had his way, he would prohibit the importation of anything that could possibly be made in Australia.

Mr. MALONEY.—I would prohibit anything coming in under fraud, and I think the honorable member would do the same.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is quite consistent. No one desires to shield fraud. The Opposition have just as great a desire to prevent it as have honorable members in the Ministerial corner; but, at the same time, we have no desire, under the pretext of stamping out fraud, to do anything that would hold up the whole trade of the port. If we could stamp out fraud by these ready methods, it would be a delightful thing to do, but I am sure that the only idea of the honorable member in regard to stamping out fraud in connexion with the trade of the port is to shut the port.

Mr. MALONEY.—The honorable member is dreaming.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope that I am. At all events, from what the Minister tells us, he intends, notwithstanding anything he may have said to the Chamber of Commerce, to make this Bill broad enough to cover all that people consume in the way of food, and all that they need in the shape of apparel and medicine. That being so, what will remain outside the scope of this measure?

Mr. SPENCE.—Furniture, jewellery, piece goods, and other things.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am reminded by the honorable member's interjection that he showed us the other day a lot of boots made of inferior leather or pasteboard, which he said had been manufactured in Australia. How would he deal with such manufactures?

Mr. SPENCE.—By so amending the Bill that it would also apply to Inter-State trade.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — I am afraid that that would not help the honorable member. It would have no effect so far as the greater part of the product of such material was concerned. Only the other day I saw a pair of boots, made in a local factory, costing a fair price, and supposed to be composed of good material. The little leather on the heel of one of these boots had worn down, and when the heel was opened it was found to be packed with paper. That kind of thing goes on in the States, and, although my honorable friends in the Ministerial corner talk about this Bill being calculated to prevent dishonest trade of that kind, they must know that it cannot do so.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member knows that we have not the power to pass a Bill that would touch that kind of trade.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Quite so; and the honorable member shows by his interjection that he recognises that the Bill will be practically useless, so far as the prevention of dishonest trade is concerned. In connexion with our oversea and Inter-State trade it is not a matter of dishonest trading. The Minister proposes to take power to prohibit various goods if they do not comply with a certain description that he himself thinks right. He proposes, if necessary, to destroy the whole of such products, if they do not comply with the standard which he himself sets up. How will the question of dishonesty arise? The Minister himself will have to say what is dishonesty in relation to these matters, and from his decision there will be no appeal. If he sees a description applied to goods which may be honestly a mistaken one, is he to say that it is dishonest? Is he to prohibit those goods and to destroy the business of the persons concerned because a mistake which he chooses to call dishonest has been made? At the present time it is generally left to the law courts to determine what is dishonesty, except in relation to matters of Customs administration. Are we to let the Minister prohibit and despoil a man's business because the latter may have interpreted a trade description in a different way from the Minister himself? A man may have done so in an honest, open, and above-board way; but, because his description does not tally with the Minister's interpretation of what is necessary, is he to have the brand of dishonesty put upon him?

Mr. WEBSTER.—The Bill provides for such cases.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — It does not. The Minister would have complete power, not only to prohibit goods, but to confiscate them. There is to be no escape from his decision except such action as he may take by way of grace. I do not think that any man conducting intricate business concerns, of which he may know a great deal more than does the Minister himself, should be treated in this way. Do not honorable members see that a business man's interpretation may be far more honest than that of the Minister, simply because the trader has a more intimate knowledge of the goods? The Minister may prescribe a standard for goods that in the long run may prove to be an inferior one. In order to comply with such a standard a man might have to produce an inferior article, whereas if left to himself he might produce a very much superior one. The Minister is to be the judge of all these matters. He is to prescribe the standard, gauge, measure, and everything else connected with the various goods coming under the operation of the Bill; but I say that neither he nor any of his officers has the requisite knowledge to determine their quality. Here is a case in point. A few years ago the Government of New South Wales assisted the fruit-growers to the extent of arranging a shipment of oranges for London and sending it there for them. A departmental fruit expert was sent to the various orchards to select the fruit, and I am told by the growers themselves that if this work had been left to them, they would have sent a different class of oranges from that which he selected. The result of this action was that the shipment—for which the Department paid the growers—arrived in London rotten, and was a huge failure. No shipment of oranges from New South Wales has since been tried. In that case a Government expert selected an inferior kind of orange for shipment to London, rather than take the opinion of those who had been in the business all their lives, and could have assisted him had they been permitted. Under this Bill, if a grower packed oranges, and they did not come up to the standard laid down by the officers of the Department, he might be held to be acting dishonestly—his goods might be confiscated, and his trade destroyed. It is all very well for honorable members opposite to "swallow" everything that the Minister says. The honorable gentleman does not know anything better with regard to all these matters.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—The honorable member does not know that we do "swallow" everything that the Minister says.

Mr. Joseph Cook.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Some honorable members appeared to accept in a very docile way every statement made by the Minister. I hold that the Minister is not a fair judge of all the ramifications of the various industries that will be covered by the Bill.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member knows that the Minister will not judge of these matters for himself.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am referring to the Minister and his officers. What does Dr. Wollaston, Mr. Smart, or any of the other officers of the Department know, for instance, about oranges?

Mr. CROUCH.—Why not appoint a board to act as general advisers to the Minister?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We should then require an expert for every trade dealt with. The Bill, if it be passed, will simply duplicate all that has been done in this direction by the States. I do not expect for one moment that the States will surrender their right to overlook these matters in the way they are doing to-day. The Minister submitted figures showing that the State grading of butter and other kinds of produce was on the increase in Victoria. If they are doing well in this State, why do we need to meddle with them? Why not let them alone?

Mr. WEBSTER.—We are not dealing only with Victoria.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—When the Minister was speaking the honorable member interjected, by way of eliciting the fact that if a State were doing well in this respect, the Minister would not interfere with its administration. But the Minister must administer this measure, when it becomes law, for all the States or none. He cannot apply it to one State and let another go free.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The Commonwealth and the States may work in unison.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Of course they may. The best way to secure that harmony would be, first of all, to obtain the consent of the Premiers of the States to such a measure as this. All efforts in that direction so far have elicited only a direct refusal on the part of the State Premiers. The matter was gone into very fully at the Hobart Conference, but the Premiers of the States would not agree to uniform action—they would not have any interference with their local arrangements. The Minister is now thrusting this Bill on them. They do not want it. Most of them are in rebellion against it; but I suppose it is because we have nothing else to do that we are taking a hand in these affairs of the States. Huge problems are overshadowing us and knocking at the door for solution, but we have nothing better to do than to adopt this meddlesome attitude with regard to functions which, according to the Minister, are being well performed to-day by most of the States.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not say that all the States are doing it, because they are not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I suppose the honorable gentleman is referring particularly to Victoria?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—To Victoria and New South Wales.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the States are doing the work well, I do not see why we should wish to meddle with them. Why not leave them alone? My contention throughout the argument has been that, with the elaborate Health Departments of the States and with the skill and experience at their command, they can do better by local arrangements than we can do by means of an unified and central authority. And there is no guarantee that when we set up to do this work the same practice will be found to have been adopted in all the States. It is not so now in respect of many matters. I apprehend that there will be the same difference in methods under this Bill. My complaint is that under the measure the Minister is taking powers to which he can find no parallel in the civilized world. I challenge him to say where there is any law like that proposed in this Bill.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—What about the passage read by the honorable member for Darwin?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Some parts of the world must always lead.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—So far as I can ascertain, other countries that interfere in these matters confine their attention simply to imports, and leave exports severely alone.

Mr. KELLY.—There are several Asiatic countries in which the law is most stringent in regard to the importation of produce.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope we are not following the example of Asiatic countries.

Mr. KELLY.—It seems like it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am afraid that the honorable member is right. This is an Asiatic proposal I fear. The only thing that differentiates it from Asiatic practice is that in Asia the principle of prohibition is carried down to the lowest affairs of life. They have prohibition of localities as well as of countries. But I repeat that the Minister and his officers cannot do what is proposed half as well as it is being now done in the States.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Not in all of the States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In most of them. The honorable member, of course, refers to those States where it is not being done by the Government. But it is done none the less. Every pound of butter that leaves Australia is graded—if not by the Government, by some other experts. A gentleman who came to Australia from London lately was very emphatic in his statement that the Government brand on butter gave it no extra value. Buyers purchase after testing the quality. The Government brand, he says, does not make the slightest difference to the large buyers of butter in London, who are well able to look after themselves. What will happen if this Bill is passed I am afraid is that less and less of our second-quality stuff will be sent abroad. Some honorable members may say that that will be a good thing. I do not agree with them.

Mr. KNOX.—There is always a market for inferior grades.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The great bulk of the working people in the older countries of Europe can never hope to buy anything but second-quality fruit, butter, cheese, and bacon. They cannot afford to buy the best. What will probably result from this Bill is that we shall shut ourselves out from that market, which is by far the largest in Great Britain at the present time. We ought to allow our exporters to send away what they like so long as it is sent honestly and fairly. We can always rest assured that the buyers at the other end will take good care to differentiate in matters of quality and price. If any action is to be taken to put a Government stamp or brand upon our exports, it ought to be with the concurrence of the States. The Minister of Trade and Customs ought not to put his meddlesome foot into the local arrangements of the States, probably interfering to the detriment of the trading and producing interests of Australia. The Minister has laid down the delightful doctrine that all we need to do is to enunciate a few general principles in the Bill, and to leave the details to be worked out by him and his officers. That is to say, according to his contention, we ought to say in the Bill that the butter exported shall be "good butter," and leave everything else to him. I am not prepared to do that. The honorable gentleman mutters that I shall have to. I suppose that I shall. He has a majority behind him. But I exercise my right to protest, and call attention to the fact that honorable members do not appear to be giving such consideration to the details of the measure as I think they ought to do. The Minister says, "Leave the details to the Department."

Mr. ROBINSON.—Leave everything to the Department!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes; I do not see why we need a Bill at all. I am sure that the present Minister of Trade and Customs would run Australia, if we only chose to let him do it. I remember reading a statement in the Age, purporting to be an interview with the honorable gentleman, wherein he declared that the Government were going to make people at the other end of the world do this, that, and the other. Give him the power, and I am sure that he would make folks "sit up." He likes nothing better, particularly if he can get a big journal to back him for all it is worth.

Mr. FISHER.—Does the honorable member think that is possible while we have a Parliament sitting?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think that the strangest possible things may be done while this Parliament is sitting. Things are being done every day that I venture to say never could happen if we had a Parliament looking after such matters, as it ought to do.

Mr. SPENCE.—Then where is the Opposition?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is doing its very best, but it happens to be in a minority. The honorable member and his party are at the back of the Government, and are supporting it in some strange things too—some of them contained in this Bill. Take the case of harvesters.

The CHAIRMAN.—Order! I think that has nothing to do with this Bill.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I graded the harvesters all right.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But the honorable gentleman has not yet proved his statements. He can grade anything under this Bill. He can prescribe anything, and there is no appeal from his decision. In the past, kings cut people's heads off because there was no one to say them nay. If this Bill once gets on the statute-book, the Minister will be the Pooh-bah of commerce in Australia, and will be able to work his own sweet will as to what is to come into the country and what is to go out of it. There may be something to be said for a despotism so long as it is benevolent, educated, and intelligent; but I am not prepared to make the honorable gentleman a despot. I know him too well. I know the many blunders he has made during his administrative career, both in his own State and since the commencement of Federation.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did something that the honorable member's party never did.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is no doubt that the honorable gentleman does things, some of which would be better left undone. Very often he has done things that the interests of Australia would have best been conserved by not doing. Those things are nothing to glory in, or to gloat over. He has done many things in the way of administration that I should be sorry to have my name associated with.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am very proud of them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am sure the honorable gentleman is. He has a happy knack of doing some things and shunting off the consequences. That is another feature of his political history. He has done many things that have brought him kudos, but some one else has had to shoulder the burden—or, to put it vulgarly, has had to whip the cat for him.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Are we to be treated to a biography of the Minister?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He is asking to be trusted with enlarged powers, and I am giving reasons why he should not have them. A very much abler and better man than he ought not to have such powers. No man ought to have them. I believe that the honorable gentleman will do his best to accomplish what he thinks ought to be done, according to his lights. But I would not give these powers to any one, because I do not think that any one man has the requisite knowledge, fairness, and judgment to deal equitably with all the trading operations of Australia. If, however, the Bill is to go through, I hope that it may be possible to prescribe a general fruit case for the Australian trade. I believe that, by the process of marking cases as containing imperial bushels, half-bushels, and quarter-bushels, it would be possible to prescribe a general case. If the Minister were to prescribe that fruit must be put up in such cases, the fruit-growers of Australia would, I believe, readily subscribe to the standard. It is not so much a common shape as a common quantity per case that is required. That is to say, fruit-growers have agreed that the imperial bushel should be the standard, so that a person purchasing a case would know exactly how much fruit it contained. At present growers put what they like in their cases. Some give as little as possible; others give full measure, pressed down and running over. This reform would be one of the most useful things that we could do by means of this measure. But, according to the Minister's own statement, what he wants to do is to prescribe common conditions for the whole of Australia as to matters which are now being better done by the States themselves. Therefore, we shall merely be duplicating machinery without securing more administrative efficiency. The Bill will be absolutely useless for the purposes for which it is intended, namely, to protect the honest trader and the consumer. It has been shown that it is impossible to protect the consumer. We cannot give him any guarantee of quality; because goods are open to manipulation after they leave the hands of the Customs officer, and it is not proposed to follow them into consumption. Therefore, in that respect, the Bill will fail. What we are asked to do—to protect honest people and to see that they get honest value—will be set aside by people who are already disposed to act dishonestly by the general public. The men who now impose dishonest values will still be able to do so by manipulating the goods after they leave the hands of the Customs officials. As to the real intention and motive of the Minister—as to the real gist of the measure—it has been abundantly shown again and again during this discussion that the objects sought will not be achieved. We had better leave this matter to the States, the authorities of which, with all their experience behind them, will be best able to safeguard the interests of the consumer and of the honest trader.

Mr. HUTCHISON (Hindmarsh).—The honorable member for Parramatta has told us that there is as much desire on the part of himself and his followers as there is amongst honorable members on the Ministerial side to put down dishonest trade, and yet the only attempt that so far has been made to deal with the matter is sought to be destroyed by the Opposition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We suggest another way.

Mr. HUTCHISON. — The honorable member has suggested nothing practical so far as I have heard.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have suggested a conference of State Premiers.

Mr. HUTCHISON. — The honorable member has suggested a good many trade matters which ought to be left entirely without regulation. The chief objection raised to the Bill, and to this clause in particular, by honorable members of the Opposition is that the measure is too drastic—that it is an interference which will hamper trade. But we have heard very little indeed about protection to the consumer, who ought to be our first consideration.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Bill will not protect the consumer. -

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I admit that the Bill will not entirely protect the consumer. For instance, many of the matters mentioned during the discussion are purely matters for the States. I was glad to hear the honorable member for North Sydney admit that we have power to regulate commerce between the States.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I think the Commonwealth may do so.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I do not pretend to be a constitutional authority, but, so far, only the honorable and learned member for Angas has said that we cannot regulate commerce between the States.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not give a deliberate opinion, but merely say that the matter is doubtful.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—That is what I understood the honorable and learned member to mean. It is said that the Bill proposes to give too much power to the Minister. My experience, however, is that powers of administration, such as these, are exercised in a very lax manner. Under the Customs Act, for instance, I am satisfied that, in the opinion of a good many of the electors, the members of the Government are not exceeding their duty in the way of administration; and it is repeatedly said that it is a pity we did not have the honorable and learned member for Adelaide longer at the head of the Customs Department. Under the circumstances, I think we have nothing to fear in regard to the Minister exceeding the powers of administration proposed to be given him by this measure. If the Minister of Trade and Customs did exceed his powers, this House would bring him up with a round turn before he had time to do any real mischief to trade. The honorable member for Parramatta tells us that this Bill will be a duplication of the systems of inspection and grading which obtain in the States. But the Bill goes a great deal further in regard to imports and exports than could any measure in an individual State.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—A great deal further for the worse.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—For the better, I think. In South Australia, at the present time, fruit, poultry, rabbits, butter, lambs and other produce are graded; and I do not think that it will be contended for a moment that if this Bill becomes law the South Australian Government should no longer continue their work of inspection. My own opinion is that when the work is found to be well done the officers employed now will continue to be employed, and the standard set by the States experts will be accepted by the Customs officers. In South Australia I have heard none of the objections to grading which have been put forward during the discussion on this Bill. I have heard no complaint of a serious character, nor indeed of a trivial character, though it has been complained two or three times that the inspector cannot be in a dozen places at once. In regard to manures, for instance, which the Minister proposes to bring under this Bill, it is necessary that there should be some protection. In South Australia not only is the protection proposed by this Bill afforded, but all manures are subject to analysis.

Mr. POYNTON.—That was done without the assistance of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Exactly. South Australia is the only State in which the analysis of manures has been carried out; and the idea is so good that I should like to see it extended throughout the Commonwealth.

Mr. CROUCH.—That has been done in Victoria for two years past.

Mr. POYNTON.—The Bill deals only with imports, and not with commodities made for use in the Commonwealth.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—A great deal of manure is imported, and the Bill ought to deal also with locally-made manures.

Mr. LONSDALE.—That is a State matter in which we cannot interfere.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We can deal with manures under this Bill if we are willing to do so.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—We can deal with manures if they are sent from State to State.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—And inspection in this respect would be very good for all concerned. The South Australian people, I believe, get a fair proportion of the card-board boots mentioned by the honorable member for Darling.

Mr. KELLY.—Where are those boots made?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—They are made in Victoria, and sold in South Australia.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member really say that card-board boots are made in Victoria?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—A great many things are done in the way of trade in New South Wales, Victoria, and also South Australia, with which I have no sympathy; and this Bill would assist in preventing dishonest practices of the kind. The whole objection to the Bill seems to be that it will interfere with trade; but honorable members lose sight of the fact that the only interference proposed is with dishonest traders. There is no attempt to interfere with the honest manufacturer, to whom, for the first time, this Bill offers protection.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Bill goes further than that.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—And I am very glad to know that the Bill does go further. Unfortunately, in my opinion, the measure is not far-reaching enough, owing to the limits imposed by the Constitution. If this Bill, as it stands, becomes law, the lives of many infants will be saved, and that is an important consideration when we want population so badly. Recently there was a medical congress in Adelaide, and Dr. Armstrong, of Sydney, there stated that the total infant mortality of England is greater by 44 per cent. than that of New South Wales, and 25 per cent. greater than the infant mortality of Sydney. Dr. Armstrong went on to say that there are 10 per cent. more deaths from diarrhoea in Sydney than in England, although pneumonia and bronchitis are 150 per cent. greater in England than in New South Wales, and the total infant mortality used to be greater in New South Wales than in England. What reason does Dr. Armstrong give for this reduction of mortality? He says that a vigorous enforcement of the adulteration of food sections of the Health Act have materially helped towards this end. Surely that is something at which it is worth while aiming. A great deal of the infants' food consumed in Australia is imported from different parts of the old world, and much of it, instead of being pure, is actually dangerous. I remember that at one time in Victoria some condensed milk, which had been imported, was found to have had 90 per cent. of the food ingredients extracted.

Mr. CROUCH.—That milk was made in Germany.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—This Bill will prevent any fraud of that kind.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That is not so.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Undoubtedly it will, because the Minister will have power to confiscate and destroy such a product.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The Bill gives no such power.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I know that the Bill provides that goods must bear a true description, but if milk were described as having had 90 per cent. of the food ingredients extracted, the Minister would doubtless confiscate it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. SPENCE.—Milk so described would not sell.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—And there the Bill would show its effect.

Mr. LEE.—But milk of that kind could be manipulated after it left the Customs.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—If we set the example by passing this Bill, the States will follow, and see that milk is not tampered with after it leaves the Customs. The States will say—"The Commonwealth has done its duty, and now it is time for us to do ours." I am glad to see that in this regard Victoria and New South Wales are moving ahead of the Commonwealth; and their action is very necessary. The honorable member for Parramatta asked whether, if this Bill would deal with medicines, apparel, and food, what else there was for it to deal with? Up to the present I have not heard one word said about jewellery, for example. People are fleeced to a most astounding extent by false jewellery, which is nearly all imported.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This Bill would not stop the sale of such jewellery.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Undoubtedly it would. The Bill would compel importers of jewellery to affix a true description, showing the quality and component parts.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Where would the description be?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Where the regulations prescribe.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—On the box containing the jewellery, I suppose?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—It is not for me to say how the descriptions are to be affixed. The honorable member for Parramatta has urged that the Minister does not know how this provision about the true description is to be carried out; but the Minister very rightly retorts that he will have the help of the experts in the Department. When a similar law was proposed in South Australia, precisely the same arguments that we have heard to-day were used. But no injury whatever has been done in that State; on the contrary, its trade has improved greatly, and the consumer, the honest merchant, and the bungler are alike protected. I believe that a good deal of the produce which is sent abroad, and which gives Australia a bad name, is the result of ignorance on the part of the exporter.

Mr. WILSON.—Where has Australia a bad name?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Our country has a bad name in England, on the Continent of Europe, in South Africa, and in America; indeed, I believe that in the last-mentioned country the importation of certain goods from Australia has been absolutely prohibited.

Mr. WILSON.—Is the honorable member of the "stinking fish" party?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—My desire is to remove any justification for the bad name which Australia may have. The honorable member for Parramatta says that buyers in the old country will ask for the quality they wish, and indicate the price they will pay. What protection is that to the consumer? Dealers in the old country are only too glad to buy margarine, and sell it under the name of butter. I remember seeing tons of it sold under the name of butter, and the people bought it as butter.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Did the honorable member know that it was margarine?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—No.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Then why does the honorable member say that it was?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We got an expert to tell us. This practice became so bad in the old country that the British Parliament had to pass legislation declaring that no margarine, or other inferior oleaginous matter, should be sold as butter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There would be some sense in that; but we cannot do that.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We can prohibit its importation into Australia.

Mr. WILSON.—We do prohibit it under the Customs Act.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We can go further, and we can prohibit inferior goods being exported from this country. I have no more desire to see my fellow-beings in other countries injured than I have to see injury done to my fellow-citizens of Australia. The honorable member for Parramatta says that the buyer will see that he does not pay too much for inferior goods, but the consumer has often to take what he can get. We know that goods are sent from other parts of the world to Australia, and, in some instances from Australia to other parts of the world, which are unfit for human consumption.

Mr. CROUCH.—Does the honorable member believe that this Bill should apply to Inter-State commerce?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. CROUCH.—Would the honorable member have a series of Customs-houses on the borders of the States?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We might require an additional Customs officer or two. The honorable and learned member will admit that these matters are regulated to some extent in Victoria, as they are in South Australia, and there is no reason why we should not regulate trade between the States as well as trade with foreign countries. If honorable members will consult the evidence which has been given before the Tariff Commission in regard to liquor alone, they will find that some of the leading distillers agree that there is hardly such a thing as pure liquor coming into Australia to-day.

Mr. FULLER.—They also say that, after it is made up into bad whisky, the refuse is made into teetotal drinks.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—With regard to teetotal drinks, Mr. Saul Joshua says that a large proportion of poisons, including fusel oil, are used in the making of temperance drinks throughout Australia. The New South Wales Government Analyst says that 50 per cent. of the temperance drinks consumed in Australia are water coloured with analyne dyes, and flavoured with amy! acetate. We have it admitted by the Government Analyst of Western Australia that at no time in its history have the liquors consumed there been so deleterious to health as at the present time.

Mr. TUDOR.—What about "Pinkey"?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Exactly. Pinkey is a brand of wine which is responsible for the death or madness of hundreds of human beings in South Australia.

Mr. POYNTON.—Not hundreds?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Hundreds, and not scores. When the honorable member for Grey goes back to Adelaide, I will be able to take him to one wine-shop where I have seen scores of men and women whose intellect has been imperilled by the consumption of the liquor referred to by the honorable member for Yarra.

Mr. KELLY.—Where does that wine come from?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Unfortunately, I have to admit that it is made in South Australia.

Mr. KNOX.—This Bill would not apply to it.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—There is no reason why it should not, and I have to tell the honorable member that if possible we shall make the Bill apply to Inter-State trade. I may also inform him that some of the bad wines of Victoria and of New South Wales are sent to South Australia. There is bad wine made in every State of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KELLY.—The dreadful wine to which the honorable member refers seems to be made in the only State which has passed similar legislation to this.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—South Australia has not passed legislation similar to this Bill, but the South Australian Legislature will shortly be asked to deal with a very much more drastic measure. They would say in South Australia that this measure could not be as effective as it ought to be, because it does not go far enough. We should therefore have no hesitation in passing a measure which will be very mild as compared with the legislation which will certainly be passed in some of the States to prevent food adulteration. Another Government analyst says that half the whisky of commerce is simply silent spirit artificially coloured. That is surely something with which we can deal. It is well known that immature whisky contains a large proportion of fusel oil, which is well known to be most injurious to health. The Committee will be failing in its duty if it does not give the Minister under this Bill power to prevent the sale of such compounds. Since I am giving information as to what is taking place in all the States, I may inform honorable members that Dr. Ham, Health Officer of Queensland, said some time ago that he found fruit syrups which had not even a nodding acquaintance with any fruit at all. Those syrups are sent to different parts of the Commonwealth. Dr. Ham also said that thirty-five chests of tea had been made by mixing magnetic acetate of iron with tea dust and sand rolled by means of starch into little pellets in imitation of genuine tea.

Mr. WILSON.—There is power under the Customs Act to prohibit that.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I am aware that that power is provided under paragraph g of section 52 of the Customs Act, but if the Minister availed himself of that power to prosecute the offenders honorable members would say that he was exceeding his duty. What I have stated shows that the administration of the Act has not been sufficiently drastic.

Mr. WILSON.—The honorable member is showing that there is no necessity for this Bill.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—There is every necessity for it, because inferior goods are exported from one part of the Commonwealth to another, and I claim that the scope of this Bill can be made to extend to Inter-State trade. An amendment in that direction will certainly be moved. I direct the attention of the Committee to the fact that on 17th October last a deputation representing the Victorian Chamber of Commerce waited on the honorable member for Gippsland, who was then Minister of Trade and Customs, to ask him to prevent the importation of poisonous drugs. The deputation declared that there was being carried on in this State "a wicked, fraudulent, and widespread traffic whereby there is wholesale and continuous destruction to human life." Is it not time that we had a measure of this kind on the statute-book, when representatives of the Chamber of Commerce come before the Minister of Trade and Customs with such a declaration as that?

Mr. WILSON.—This Bill will not stop that.

Mr. TUDOR.—If the honorable member moves an amendment that will stop it, we will support it.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—It is the duty of every member of the Committee who is aware that destruction of life is going on as the result of the importation and consumption of deleterious drugs to assist in enacting legislation which will put an end to such a state of affairs.

Mr. KELLY.—The only way is to amend the Constitution.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—An amendment of the Constitution is not required. Dr. Gresswell, who was chairman of the Melbourne Board of Health—

Mr. TUDOR.—He was the best health officer in Australia.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I quite agree with the honorable member. Dr. Gresswell said that adulteration was going on here.

Mr. WILSON.—This Bill will not prevent it.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—We can, under this Bill, prevent the introduction of any goods containing anything of a poisonous or deleterious nature. Let us consider what other countries have done in this matter. Even in Japan the use of saccharine in foods is absolutely prohibited. We could exercise our power similarly.

Mr. WILSON.—Would the honorable member prohibit the importation of saccharine?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—No; but I would restrict its use. I would not prohibit the importation of either opium or fusel oil, but I would prevent them from getting into human consumption.

The CHAIRMAN.—The question is the omission of the word "quality."

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I am trying to show that, if the word "quality" is left out, we cannot deal with the evils to which I have referred. It has been suggested by the Minister that he may bring down a schedule.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No. I do not intend to do so.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I would not object to a schedule, if it were provided that other goods besides those mentioned in it might be dealt with under a proclamation. Let us make the provisions of the Bill as wide as we can, instead of restricting them. The sale of boots with card-board soles must be largely responsible for cases of consumption, and other troubles amongst children, as the honorable member for Corangamite knows.

Mr. WILSON.—It would be better if parents did as I do, and let their children run about without boots.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—That would be a thousand times better than to let them wear boots with soles like sponges. I do not think that honest traders have anything to fear under the Bill, but I hope that the Committee will not agree to the striking out of the word "quality," or any other word in this clause, because it is our duty to make the provisions of the Bill as wide as possible.

Mr. LEE (Cowper).—The Minister told us that a great number of the people he met at the Albury show last week were in favour of grading.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Those connected with the export trade, and especially those connected with the butter trade, are in favour of it.

Mr. LEE.—I received a letter last week, which shows that three-fourths of those connected with the butter industry in New South Wales are opposed to grading. The largest co-operative company in that State—

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Byron Bay Company?

Mr. LEE.—No; I refer to a co-operative company which represents the largest number of farmers in the State. That company would be willing to have the Government brand placed on its produce if it would thereby gain an advantage, and only recently sent a man home to England to see if it is an advantage in the disposal of produce for butter to bear a Government brand. He has reported, however, that English buyers are not influenced by the Government brand. What they look for is the factory brand, and they buy on the reputation of the factory.

Mr. FISHER.—Does not the honorable member see that there is good reason for that, because of the misuse of the Government brand in Victoria?

Mr. LEE.—The representative of one of the largest Scotch butter importing firms gave sworn evidence in Sydney that a Government brand is of no value as establishing the quality of the produce on which it is placed. The brand is placed on butter when it is new, but that butter may afterwards, because of the market being unfavorable, be kept in a cool store for three or four months, during which time it may deteriorate, so that when sold for sale, although branded by the Government expert as of first grade, it may be of inferior quality. The honorable member for Hindmarsh said that, in all probability, the Commonwealth would accept the grading of the States; but, in doing that, we should be no better off than we are now. The provision that goods must be properly described is no protection to English consumers. For instance, a creamery company might put on the market butter which was the greatest rubbish; but, if it described it as creamery butter, the description would be a true one, and would therefore satisfy the requirements of the Act.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If the butter were inferior, that would have to be shown.

Mr. LEE.—The makers might not call it finest, or best, butter, but simply mark it creamery butter, and if it were butter which had been made at a creamery the description would be a true one. The action now proposed to be taken by the Commonwealth is twenty years behind the action which has been taken by the States. The Government say that they will prevent fraudulent exportation, but they cannot prevent the exportation of goods which are truly described.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—We can say what descriptions shall be applied.

Mr. LEE.—I have taken a most active part in encouraging grading in the butter trade, because I thoroughly believe in it; but, so far as New South Wales is concerned, the factories are thoroughly up-to-date in this matter, and put their produce on the market properly graded, according to quality. There has been no demand for this Bill, because what is proposed to be done is being done better by the Governments of the States. I have no objection to the prohibition of the importation of goods injurious to the public health, but I think that the evils which have been spoken of can be dealt with under the Health and Adulteration Acts of the States. The honorable member for Hindmarsh told us that milk is imported here from which nine-tenths of the cream has been extracted, but further importation will not be stopped by the Bill, because the article can be described as skimmed milk, and brought in under that description, being sold afterwards under any description the vendor likes to place on it.

Mr. WILSON.—It must be described in that way to comply with the provisions of the English Act.

Mr. LEE.—Yes. We are wasting time in dealing with this measure, because it will hamper commerce, and will not be as effective as the States Acts. The Minister thinks that, by using the word "quality" in the clause, he can improve the quality of the exports of Australia; but the Bill will not have that effect. Neither will it improve the quality of importations. If it would do either, I would assist the passing of it. In this legislation we are following a long way after the States, although we should lead, and the States are simply laughing at us. I shall support the amendment.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—I have listened with considerable interest and attention to the speeches on the amendment, but I have not been able to harmonize the grounds of opposition to the proposal in the Bill. We are told that the measure gives the Minister too much power, and will make him autocratic, and that it places the import and export trade of Australia under a control to which it should not be submitted. Then we are told that the Bill will accomplish nothing; that it is powerless to effect the purposes aimed at; and that the States legislation is ahead of what is proposed. I am not disposed to regard the measure from either of these extreme standpoints. I have felt for a considerable time past that legislation of this kind is absolutely necessary, in the interests of the public health. The consumer is not always able to protect himself. He has very often to accept the goods which he buys on the description applied to them, whether they are goods manufactured within Australia or imported goods. Unprincipled manufacturers very frequently trade on the good reputation built up by their honest competitors, and consumers have occasion to complain that they are not sufficiently protected by State legislation against trade frauds. With regard to the export trade, we must be careful to cultivate our markets. We can only hope to achieve success in this direction by supplying the very best articles, and catering for the tastes of our customers. Unfortunately, our experience has shown us that while some exporters, with a full appreciation of the necessity for putting a superior article on the market, have supplied goods of high quality, and have achieved a good reputation, unprincipled persons have exported inferior goods, and eventually destroyed the reputation of our goods, and thus lost the market. The Bill is intended to prevent anything of the kind in the future. It will afford an outlet to the honest trader, and find a profitable outlet for our produce. Some honorable members appear to think that exporters who have hitherto been sending inferior produce will, under the system of classification proposed, be placed at a disadvantage, owing to their goods being classed with inferior goods; but nothing of that kind is contemplated. On the other hand, the exporters will secure the full benefit attaching to the description of his produce. In South Wales, considerable consideration has been shown to Government proposals for the export of produce intended for foreign markets, but, wherever that system has been adopted, it has been found to operate to the interests of the legitimate exporters. I am informed on good authority that in the first instance, many farmers in New Zealand objected to Government interference, they having much advantage from the system of grading adopted in that colony; but they are now amongst its supporters. I feel sure that the same change of opinion will take place in Australia. The production of leather is a natural industry in New South Wales, and one of the largest stock-producing industries of the Commonwealth. Instead of sending out our hides, we should be able to send out to the markets of the world leather in finished form and to find a profitable market for it. We are told, however, by one of the commercial agents of New South Wales, that the mere fact that leather comes from Australia is sufficient to condemn it, not due to the fact that our tanners are able to produce a good article, but that inferior goods have been exported, and as a result that the market has been

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I would not remedy that evil.

Mr. BROWN.—I trust that that effect. We shall, at least, prevent the exportation of leather of inferior manufacture of which bairn is used. We should also be able to exercise some supervision over the Intercolonial trade. The honorable member for Darling has indicated the extent to which paltry and rubbishy materials have been used for leather, in the manufacture of shoes. The boot manufacture South Wales have been subjected to a great deal of unfair competition on the part of competitors in Victoria and elsewhere, who have been using improper substitutes for leather, and we should do our best to put a stop to such practices. The honorable and learned member for Angas contends that it is not within our power to control Inter-State trade, but I think that we should at least make an effort to do so. If the High Court holds that we have not the necessary powers, we shall be in no worse position than at present. There is urgent need for legislation of this description, and we should endeavour to fully meet the requirements of the case. Whilst it is desirable that in the interest of our growing export business, we should send to other parts of the world the best articles we can produce, it is also necessary that we should protect our consumers against being imposed upon in regard to imported goods. Many imported articles of food and of wearing apparel are the subjects of adulteration, and not only are the public grossly imposed upon, but great injury is inflicted upon the health of the community by the trade deceptions now practised. I am informed that in Germany and other Continental countries the most stringent provisions are enforced against the adulteration of foodstuffs intended for home consumption, but that manufacturers are allowed an absolutely free hand with regard to similar goods intended for export. The consequence is that we are having foisted upon us a number of poisonous preparations and shoddy articles which should be prevented from entering into consumption.

Mr. WILSON.—Unfortunately, this Bill does not deal with that question.

Mr. BROWN.—It will do so, so far as we can exercise any control. German manufacturers are now exporting to Australia goods which improperly bear some of the best of English trade marks. In the case of cutlery, for instance, the names of some of the best Sheffield makers are attached to worthless goods, and in this way not only are our consumers being imposed upon, but grave injury is being done to British manufacturers, with whom it should be our desire to do business. The Bill should provide machinery that would put a stop to such importations in future. I am also informed that jewellery manufactured in foreign countries is stamped as being of a higher grade than it really is.

Jewellery of local manufacture has to be stamped according to the quality of the metal used, whereas foreign jewellery is subject to no such regulation. Something should be done to put an end to such unfair competition with local industry. I am not wedded to the Bill in its present form. I hope that it will be greatly improved, and that members of the Opposition will lend their aid with that end in view. I am strongly impressed with the necessity for legislation of this kind, and I think that if we lead the way the States will afterwards be able to supplement our work. The Minister will act wisely if he consults the States which have already passed legislation of a similar character, with a view to bringing the Commonwealth administration into harmony with that of the States. No doubt considerable diversity in legislation and practice now obtains, and if we can bring about some degree of uniformity we shall secure a higher degree of efficiency than has been yet attained. Instead of being a petty piece of legislation unworthy of the Federal Parliament, as one honorable member has suggested, this is a measure of far-reaching importance. For many years we have been urged to take action in this direction, and I hold that the Bill is worthy of a Legislature which professes a desire to promote the best interests of the people of Australia. If the Opposition can suggest any amendments that will improve the Bill, I trust that they will bring them forward, and that the result of our efforts will be the passing of a measure that will be worthy of the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—I am not at all clear whether we are acting wisely in proposing to pass this provision. It is unnecessary to say anything as to the necessity for excluding importations of food unfit for human consumption. I am sure that honorable members on all sides are agreed as to the wisdom of that being done; but I fail to see that the Bill will assist us to that end. It will require traders to give proper descriptions of certain classes of goods, but it certainly will not protect the people from the consumption of unwholesome food. Whilst it is highly important that we should shut out deleterious foodstuffs or shoddy articles, it is equally important that the public should be protected from such goods when made within the States themselves. It is because the Bill will not enable proper supervision to be exercised over locally-manufactured products that I am inclined to think it is somewhat premature. The co-operation of the States is necessary, otherwise the Bill will become to a great extent a dead-letter, or may be tyrannously administered to the special advantage of the protectionist cause. If the operation of the Bill were extended to Inter-State trade, I am afraid that we should return to something like the condition of affairs that prevailed prior to the abolition of the border duties. We have no information as to the extent to which the Government propose to go. So far as I can gather, the Minister has given us no indication of the way in which it is proposed to administer the Bill. The limited list of goods to which it is said that the Bill will apply, includes butter, fruits, wines, meats, food generally, apparel and manures. If the desire of the honorable member for Hindmarsh is to be complied with, it will also extend to patent medicines. Under the term "food generally," a variety of imports will be affected. I should like to know whether ordinary Customs officers are to determine their quality, and to decide whether they conform to proper trade descriptions. For instance, is an ordinary Customs officer to determine whether apparel, consisting of an admixture of wool and cotton, is correctly described, or whether patent medicines are in accordance with the description which they bear? In order to supervise the importation of a few of these lines, at least fifty experts will have to be employed.

Mr. KNOX.—At every port.

Mr. POYNTON.—I would not say that, although if the Bill is to apply to goods of every description, it is difficult to say how many experts will be necessary.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The States which deal with these matters experience no difficulty.

Mr. SPENCE.—There are health officers, for instance, in the different States.

Mr. POYNTON.—But the State officer, dealing with meats, has nothing to do with fruits, and a Government fruit expert has nothing to do with the supervision of butter. When the Minister was speaking I inquired whether it was proposed to utilize the services of the States officers, and received the reply, "We may, or may not."

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If it is possible to work with the States and to avail ourselves of the services of their officers that will be done.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Are they to be Federal officers?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I cannot give a definite statement on that point.

Mr. ROBINSON.—To whom are they to be responsible?

Mr. POYNTON.—That is what I wish to know, and it is because of the absence of information in regard to these matters that I am inclined to think that the Government proposal is somewhat premature.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—When it is proposed to employ States officers under any Bill that is generally provided for in the Bill itself.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—We utilize the services of many States officers at the present time.

Mr. POYNTON.—Will the Minister object to an amendment providing that the work shall be done by officers of the States?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Certainly; I do not think we ought to be bound down in that way if the States would not agree to something reasonable.

Mr. POYNTON. — Some arrangement should have been made in the first place with the States themselves. It was proposed last session to ride rough-shod over the States by establishing a Federal Bureau of Agriculture; but so far very little headway has been made with that proposition. When the matter was before the House, I said that the proper course would be to endeavour to secure the co-operation of the States, and I feel that I may safely say that the Government of the State of which I am a representative would readily assist the Commonwealth in carrying out the object which we are seeking by this Bill to achieve. But the Commonwealth Government might, at least, have had a consultation with the Governments of the States. Whether I am sitting on the Government benches, or in opposition, I shall never vote for a duplication of the work of States officials. Every measure of this kind that we pass means the creation of a new Department, the cost of which, as "new expenditure," will have ultimately to be borne by the States. Proof of my contention that we need the co-operation of the States in carrying out the objects which we have in view is to be found in the fact that the Bill will not prevent shoddy articles being foisted on the people. All that it will do will be to prevent importation or exportation under false descriptions. Even if this Bill be passed, the shoddy exhibited by the honorable member for Darling may still be distributed all over the States.

Mr. SPENCE.—An amendment should be moved providing that the Bill shall apply to Inter-State trade.

Mr. FULLER.—Then we shall want officers at every border town.

Mr. POYNTON.—The Bill as it stands would not, for instance, prevent the "Pinky" to which the honorable member for Hindmarsh referred, being sold in South Australia, or sent to other States. The more we consider the measure the stronger must be our conviction that in order to make it a success we must have the co-operation of the States. I hope that the Minister will be able to give us an assurance that the Bill will not mean a duplication of State and Federal officers.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I certainly do not see why it should; I do not think there is the slightest chance of it.

Mr. POYNTON.—If the States had been approached, I am sure that the position would have been improved. I feel satisfied that some at least of the States would not have thrown any obstacle in the way of our passing legislation on these lines. The only question is as to what are the right lines to follow. It is not my desire that a measure shall be passed which, unless it is to have some practical application, may prove a scourge for our backs. If this Bill becomes a dead letter, we shall have been subjected to the abuse of those who opposed it without having afforded any benefit to the people. I certainly am not afraid to accept the responsibility for any action I may take as a member of this Parliament, but it is doubtful whether any benefit will be derived from the passing of the Bill in the absence of the co-operation of the States. It is clear that it will not prevent many of the abuses to which reference has been made. It might prevent shoddy from coming in under a misdescription; but there would be nothing to prevent its distribution under another name.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Shoddy leather could be described as "leatherine," and as such distributed all over the States.

Mr. POYNTON.—That is so.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — In the view of those who wish to kill the Bill, dreadful things may be done.

Mr. POYNTON.—I hope that the Minister will recognise that neither I nor my honorable colleague is offering factious opposition to the Bill, and I sincerely trust that he will offer us further information before we are asked to vote on these provisions.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—Some of the difficulties to which reference has been made may be real, but I am satisfied that many of them have been greatly exaggerated. Objection has been raised that, if the Bill were amended as I propose, the cost of its administration would be materially increased. The Bill declares that certain things shall be done with regard to imports and exports, but in giving effect to these provisions we shall not need an army of inspectors on the State borders. If goods made in Victoria are sold in Riverina, and it is discovered that they are not as described, the purchaser would have his remedy, and the remainder of the stock would be liable to forfeiture.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—No.

Mr. SPENCE.—The importer of the goods into New South Wales would certainly have a remedy against the fraudulent manufacturer.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Not under this Bill, after the goods had been imported into another State.

Mr. SPENCE.—Why not?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It would not be constitutional.

Mr. SPENCE.—I trust that the Minister will consider the point, with the view of so framing the Bill that there may be a provision of the kind incorporated. At any rate, the States have power to pass Acts in co-operation with the Commonwealth measure. True, we cannot make them do so, but if we lead the way, they will naturally have to follow. I have not sufficient legal knowledge to enable me to say whether, in this Bill, we can go further than to deal with goods passing through the Customs House. But it appears to me that, even after that stage, they could be made liable to forfeiture if they were found to be inferior to what they were described as being. Suppose goods were imported from abroad, and it was not discovered that they were adulterated until they had passed through the Customs House, does the honorable member for North Sydney mean to say that there would be no remedy?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Not after they are delivered.

Mr. SPENCE.—While there may be difficulties surrounding the problem, we should certainly go as far as our constitutional powers will permit. In other legislation we have dealt with matters intimately affecting the citizens of the Commonwealth, and, even if we cannot follow up goods after they have passed through the Customs, I am satisfied that it is possible for us to impose some check. At all events, a prosecution would lead to an exposure, and manufacturers would soon find that it was not worth while to take the risk. I have a word to say in reply to those who urge that it would be necessary to employ a large staff of inspectors to carry out this measure. Some of the States already provide for the inspection of exports. If such inspectors certify that goods are of a good quality, it will not be necessary for the Commonwealth to inspect them again.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—But the States might expect us to pay for the inspection.

Mr. SPENCE.—No, they would not. For instance, the State of Victoria provides for the inspection of butter. If the Victorian inspector guarantees the quality of a consignment of butter as not likely to lower the credit of Australian products in a foreign market, that fact should be quite sufficient for the Customs officers, and no further inspection should be required. That is the common-sense view of the matter. It is ridiculous to suppose that the Government would appoint other inspectors to do work that had already been done successfully by State officers.

Mr. POYNTON.—How would imports be dealt with?

Mr. SPENCE. — It might be easy to make arrangements with the States. The Minister could arrange with a State Government that the officers employed to inspect exports could also deal with imports. An expert employed by a State to inspect a certain class of exports could likewise inspect the same class of imports. Our object being to conserve the interests of the taxpayers and consumers, the work could be done without any material increase in cost, and I feel sure that the States would show readiness to co-operate with us to that end.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—They might dismiss their experts after the Commonwealth Act was passed.

Mr. SPENCE.—If the States experts are doing satisfactory work, the States are not likely to dispense with their services. But even if they did, the Commonwealth could avail themselves of their services, and the cost to the taxpayer would be the same. It does not matter much whether the work is done by the Commonwealth or by a State, so long as there is only one payment. Much of it could be done by the Customs officers already employed. All the talk about the Minister being expected to inspect goods is mere nonsense. The Minister would be guided by his officers; and many of the Customs officers are experts in particular kinds of goods. The inspection of imports will pay the community in the long run. By its means we secure that goods of good quality go into consumption, and thereby conserve the health of the public, and save their pockets in regard to medical expenditure. Some samples which I produced on Friday have given rise to questions as to whether the goods were imported. I may say at once that what is done here in regard to the manufacture of boots from inferior materials is also done in other countries. Only lately I was speaking to a man who had been employed in the boot trade in England, and he told me that large quantities of boots are made for export in which card-board and straw-board are used instead of leather for parts that are not exposed to view. Therefore, no special condemnation of local manufacturers was involved in the samples which I showed. Such goods, when worn in damp weather, would be liable to give severe colds to the wearer, and to damage his health. From every point of view it is advantageous to the taxpayer that his interests should be protected by such inspection as can be secured by means of this Bill.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—Judging by expressions we have heard during this discussion, the conclusion might be arrived at that the Commonwealth may expect nothing but antagonism from the States in the administration of this measure. But I do not think we are justified in any anticipation of the kind. In my opinion the States will co-operate with the Commonwealth Government in the effort now being made to restore or maintain the good name of Australia in the markets of the world, and to secure, as far as possible, that unadulterated products only shall be admitted into this country. We have had evidence lately in Australia that there is more than one kind of thief—that, as Shakespeare says, there is the thief who steals one's purse, and the thief who steals one's good name. Indeed, in Australia we have had persons who would steal both the purse and the good name of the community. I take it that, in the opinion of honorable members, and of the people generally, one of the most important objects we can have in our legislation is to preserve the good name of Australia in the markets where Australian goods are sold. Whether this Bill will achieve that end seems to be a matter of opinion, regulated according to the side of the House on which honorable members sit. The Bill is, perhaps, not all that we should like it to be, or all that by-and-by we may be able to make it; but I am strongly of opinion that it represents a step in the right direction. Even if the fear of the honorable member for Grey be in part realized, namely, that the administration of the Bill will add to the public expenditure, I suggest that the improved standing of Australian products will more than repay us. The honorable member for Cowper, speaking this afternoon, informed us that, in the opinion of a number of butter producers in New South Wales, a Government brand is of no advantage to those concerned in the sale of that commodity. That opinion is, I know, shared by some of the butter producers in Queensland; but I have here an extract from the Brisbane Courier of Saturday last, which throws a rather different light on the case. It is only within the last few months that the Queensland Government have begun to grade butter for the London market; and any one who takes an interest in the subject cannot but have noticed the improved standing of the Queensland product in the markets of Europe. Before the Government began to brand the exports, Queensland butter occupied the very lowest position amongst Australian butter in the quotations, but now, under the new Dairy Act, the commodity from the northern State is rapidly rising to a position of equality.

Mr. GROOM. — The Sydney Morning Herald of last Saturday had an article on the success of the grading of butter in Queensland.

Mr. WILSON. — Will this Bill not interfere with the systems of grading now carried out in the States?

Mr. GROOM. — Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. Wilkinson.

Mr. WILKINSON. — I shall read this quotation for the purpose of showing the importance which is attached to the Government brand by those who handle our goods on the other side of the world. The brand is accepted as indicative of quality, and the paragraph shows that the grading facilitates trade in exports of this kind, inasmuch as, relying on the brand, importers in the old country are enabled to make forward sales. The paragraph is from the London correspondent of the Brisbane Courier, under date 11th August, and is as follows:—

The Tooley-street agents who received the first of the Queensland butter shipped under the new Dairy Act speak approvingly of the results of the Government grading. So far, they say, it is quite satisfactory. They do not expect that it will make any appreciable difference to prices in the present state of the market, but they express the opinion that it cannot fail to add to the reputation of Queensland butter if it be carried out with uniform care. For a full test of the system they will wait until the next summer shipments arrive. But on one point they agree at once—namely, that proper grading will facilitate “forward” buying, and add to the growing confidence among country buyers in the imports from Queensland. The butter has been gaining steadily in repute on its merits during the last twelve months, and grading will assist this progress. When the adoption of a definite system of grading in Victoria was under discussion a few months ago, it was suggested that grading at the port of shipment might in some cases prevent the London agents from getting the full value of the butter, as, for instance, if parcels passed as second grade in Melbourne became equal to first grade on the homeward voyage. No change of this kind was noticed in the shipment of Queensland butter which came in the steamer Marathon, according to the firms which sold the bulk of it. They think that any improvement which may take place in second grade butter included in later shipments will as a rule be noted and allowed for, especially when the selling market is in a good condition. The Victorian Government inspector gives the same opinion. He says that any disadvantages attached to grading for the London market are far outweighed by the advantages gained.

The same remarks would, in my opinion, apply to fruit and other perishable or semi-perishable goods exported from Australia. If our fruit were branded, it would be a guarantee to the agents and dealers that it had been inspected and ascertained to be of good quality and condition when shipped, and this would inspire confidence, which, unfortunately, has been too much shaken by the condition in which produce has been sent to England in the past.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra). — I am glad to hear from the honorable member for Moreton that the Government grading of butter in Queensland has had such good effects. It is contended by persons largely interested in this industry in New Zealand that Government grading has proved a distinct advantage in that Colony. I desire, however, to speak more particularly of New South Wales, where opinion appears to be divided on the subject. The honorable member for Cowper told us this afternoon, that at a meeting held under the auspices of the large co-operative dairying company in New South Wales two or three months ago, about three-fourths of the farmers of the State were represented, and a resolution was carried in opposition to Government interference in the industry. I know that in my own district opinion is divided; but I am not called upon to indicate which feeling predominates. In a great industry of this sort, every one engaged in it should have an opportunity of being heard. The Coastal Farmers' Co-operative Company were represented at the meeting to which I have referred, and I have already informed honorable members the nature of the resolution passed.

Mr. GROOM.—Does that company do any grading?

Mr. FULLER. — I presume that they examine the various brands, and probably notify their agents abroad as to their character. In some of the factories and central creameries of New South Wales cream is graded in order to insure the uniform quality of the butter, and this system has been found of great advantage. There is a strong feeling, however, at the present time that the less the Government interfere with the industry the better. Without any aid from the State, this large industry has been successfully built up, and many of those concerned are adverse to any legislation of the kind proposed in this clause. In consequence of the different opinions held, the proper way to have dealt with the matter would have been to give all parties concerned an opportunity of stating their case, which could have been done if the amendment of the honorable member for Kooyong, for which I voted, had been adopted. It appears to me that if this proposal be adopted it will be necessary to have many experts grading butter and other commodities for the various markets of the world. A butter expert will not be a piano expert, and so on; so that it would appear necessary to have a large army of inspectors at each port of shipment. If that be so, it will afford another opportunity to those people who, without, so far as I can see, any just grounds, are always harping on alleged extravagance in connexion with the Federal expenditure. Much has been said as to the effect this Bill will have in preventing the importation of deleterious articles for human consumption; but my opinion is that in this respect the Bill will fail. If, for example, whisky of an inferior character is imported in casks branded with a proper description of the article they contain, this Bill will not prevent its introduction into the Commonwealth. It may afterwards be taken out of bulk and sold in bottles or in tumblers to consumers. The same thing will apply to all cognate articles. This Bill cannot prevent that being done. I am at one with honorable members who have dealt with the matter from the consumer's point of view. We know well that consumers in all parts of the Commonwealth have from time to time loudly complained of the deleterious nature of many of the articles passed on to them for consumption, more particularly in the country districts. In Sydney we have under an Act a number of inspectors, whose duty it is to inquire into these things, and, as the result of their inspection, articles of a deleterious character are, to a large extent, prevented from going into consumption in that city. But the representatives of big firms make no secret of the fact that inferior stuff is transferred to the country districts and sold there, to the detriment of the inhabitants of those places. How will this Bill prevent that state of things? There is no provision to deal with it any more than there is provision to deal with the other difficulty to which I have referred. It has been said that the Bill will be effective in keeping out shoddy articles. I should like to know whether it is the intention of the Minister to, in this way, keep out articles which now come into competition with goods produced in the Commonwealth? If it is the object of the Minister to use the power conferred under this Bill for that purpose — and I believe it would be possible to so use it — honorable members should hesitate before they give any Minister of Trade and Customs such a power. It appears to me that, if any attempt is to be made to apply the measure to Interstate trade, it will involve the restoration of the old border Customs Houses. Having listened to the debate, I feel that there is a great difference of opinion amongst honorable members on that phase of the question, and I should like the Minister to give the Committee some assurance that that is not likely to follow from the passing of this Bill. I feel sure that honorable members generally do not desire a return to the old system of border Customs, or the creation of additional staffs of Government officials at our various ports. The honorable gentleman might give some explanation in connexion with the matters to which I have referred when he next addresses the Committee.

Mr. WILKS (Dalley).—The discussion on this clause would appear to be as keen as that on the second reading of the measure. I strenuously opposed the second reading, because, while I was not opposed to the intention of the Bill, as presented by the Minister of Trade and Customs, I doubted very much whether it would carry out that intention. Honorable members are aware also that I opposed the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee. Now that it has run the gauntlet of a second reading, and a majority of honorable members are apparently satisfied that it will achieve the object for which it has been introduced, we have an amendment moved which will absolutely destroy the measure as an instrument for achieving that object.

Mr. WILSON.—The honorable member does not understand why it was moved.

Mr. WILKS.—I am not concerned with the motives which induced the honorable and learned member for Angas to move the amendment. I am concerned with the interests of the consumer, and I believe that some legislation of this kind is required to protect consumers from the sale of deleterious foods and drugs. I previously contended that this could better be effected by States legislation than by Federal legislation, but the second reading having been agreed to, I object to an amendment which will prevent the measure having any useful effect. Some honorable members on this side have said that there is no demand for it. That is a very peculiar objection to urge against such a Bill. Consumers are not organized for the protection of their own interests, whilst we are all aware that producers and exporters are, for financial purposes, powerfully organized.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Importers are also.

Mr. WILKS.—That is so. The commercial morality of the importer is neither better nor worse than that of the protectionist manufacturer. Both these sections of the community seek for gain. Their concern is not for the comfort and health of the community. I do not attack the manufacturer any more than the importer in this connexion. I know that there are importers and manufacturers who would scorn to distribute commodities of a deleterious character, but I am also aware that there are some of both classes who would take advantage of competition to put into circulation the cheaper and inferior classes of goods for purposes of profit. Let us analyze the objection that there has been no demand for this measure. We do not find the burglar asking for increased police protection, or that there should be greater difficulty placed in the way of his trade.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Who is the burglar in this instance?

Mr. WILKS.—I shall deal with that presently. Though consumers are not organized, we know that they and their children suffer from the consumption of deleterious compounds, and it is right that some action should be taken to protect them.

Mr. WILSON.—This Bill will not protect them.

Mr. WILKS.—On the second reading, I said that it would not, but the majority of honorable members are determined that we shall go on with the measure, and I am prepared to give the benefit of the doubt to the Ministry. No one will look upon me as an ardent supporter of the present Administration, but now that the Bill has reached the Committee stage I am prepared to deal with it on its merits. In refraining from calling for a division on the second reading, honorable members, who asserted that it would not carry out the intention for which it was introduced, have admitted that there is something in the measure.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It can effect some purpose.

Mr. WILKS.—If it is to effect any useful purpose at all the amendment must not be accepted. Another argument used is that the passing of the Bill will involve the appointment of an army of experts. The honorable member for Illawarra talked of an expert on butter, and an expert on pianos. We are not greatly concerned with the distribution of inferior pianos, which do very little injury except perhaps to the nerve centres, but we are greatly concerned with the distribution of inferior foods and deleterious drugs. I remind honorable members that the Minister has already, under the Customs Act, an army of experts who will be able to carry out many of these duties.

Mr. WILSON.—Will they be able to grade butter?

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member is arguing from the producers' stand-point, whilst I am speaking from the consumers' stand-point. I am aware that a member of the Commonwealth Parliament is supposed to represent the interests of the Australian community as a whole, but there are some constituencies which are specially interested in the matter of imports, and others which are specially interested in the matter of exports. My concern in this matter is to protect the very large consuming population that I represent. My electors are not producers of goods for export, but many thousands of them are the easy prey of those importing and distributing the class of inferior goods which this Bill is intended to legislate against. I desire to protect my constituents from the distribution of deleterious foods and drugs.

Mr. WILSON.—How will this Bill effect that?

Mr. WILKS.—I fought that question out on the second reading, but now that we have reached the Committee stage I am prepared to give those who support the measure an opportunity to make it effective for the purpose for which it has been introduced. I have already said that I believe that legislation of this kind could be better dealt with by the States Parliaments, but it is a public duty to protect consumers in the way I have suggested, and also to protect fair traders from the injury done them by those who are guilty of commercial immorality. There can be no doubt that local manufacturers distribute deleterious compounds. That is a scandal, but it only shows that the States Legislatures should have taken action in the matter. It is no reason why, when we have reached the Committee stage of this Bill, we should not give the Minister an opportunity to carry out the object for which he says he introduced it. The word "quality" is, in my opinion, essential in this clause if honest importers and exporters to be protected. It has been said time after time that the producers of Australia have suffered because designing exporters have put on the British or other markets goods which were not up to standard. The Bill has been introduced to make an end to such practices, and, therefore, although I am not a supporter of the Ministry, I feel bound to vote for it. I intend that the Government shall be armed as effectively as possible to carry out its provisions. If that is done, the responsibility for defects in administration will lie at their door. If, however, the Bill proves effective, and is properly administered, the health of the community will be protected, and honest traders will be assisted by others being required to observe a standard of commercial morality which at present seems to be at a sad discount. These remarks are not an imputation upon either the importers or the manufacturers as a whole. The members of neither class are philanthropists; they are business men who wish to make as much money as they can each year. But some of them have a lower standard of dealing than others would stoop to, and put on the market inferior articles which impose on the public. I know of a case in which a particular friend of the Minister, who is a boot manufacturer in New South Wales, and an ardent and well-known protectionist, used to pass off his wares as American-made, because he knew that American brands were fashionable, and thought he would thereby secure larger sales. But whatever may be the need of the public for protection against imposition in the matter of wearing apparel and articles of luxury, such as pianos, our great concern should be the purity of our food supplies, and of the drugs which we use. As I think that the omission of the word "quality" would destroy the Bill, I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—In my opinion, this is a measure which should not have been brought before the Federal Parliament, because it deals with matters which should engage the attention of the Parliaments of the States, and in regard to which some of the States have already Acts in operation. One of my main objections to the Bill is that it is too comprehensive. But, although it seeks to do so much, it would, if passed into law, probably effect very little. It is full of mischievous provisions, clause 3 in particular being loaded with proposals of an objectionable character. I believe that attempts to put into operation the provisions of section 52 of the Customs Act—which, if it were possible to carry into effect, would achieve the main object of the Bill—have failed because the Department has not been able to procure the necessary expert evidence in regard to the quality of the goods to which it has been sought to apply them. It seems to me that it will be impossible for any Customs officer to say whether a trade description correctly describes the material or ingredients of which goods are composed, or from which they are derived. To demonstrate his ability to do so, a man would have to undergo an examination in regard to the manufacture of every conceivable article of merchandise. But no man could acquire even a rudimentary knowledge of the processes of manufacture or production of more than a dozen or two articles. The alternative is to employ an army of experts, acquainted with the details of every branch of manufacture and production of goods of every conceivable kind for importation and exportation. That, however, would mean an immensely increased expenditure. I do not suppose that it is the intention of the framers of the Bill to bring into existence a new Department; but to ask the Customs officials to do the work is manifestly imposing on them an impossible task. The Bill places in the hands of the Minister a power which I object to place in the hands of any Minister. It allows him, in the event of the contravention of its provisions, to order the confiscation of imports. In the hands of an unscrupulous Minister—

The CHAIRMAN.—The Bill is not under discussion, neither is clause 3. The honorable member must confine his remarks to the proposed omission of the word "quality."

Mr. JOHNSON.—I shall support the amendment, because I should like to see the clause omitted, and because I see no need for the Bill itself. In expressing that view, I am fortified by the opinion of the Attorney-General of New South Wales, as expressed in an interview. Sir William Lyne defended the Commerce Bill on the ground that it was based upon the Imperial Merchandise Marks Act of 1887. Mr. Wade said, in this interview, that there was a marked difference between the two—

"The primary object of the English law," observed the Attorney-General, "is to prevent the fraudulent use of trade marks, and as a complement to that provision there is a provision against the use of fraudulent trade descriptions. In the Federal Commerce Bill the maker of goods may or may not, as he thinks fit, apply a trade mark to a trade description of his goods. The English Act not only provides that the producer who attaches the false trade description shall be liable to a penalty, but also any person selling those goods who has the knowledge that the description is false.

"Sir William Lyne is mistaken when he says the definition of a false trade description is copied from the English law. The presence of the words 'omitted therefrom' is a danger in the Commerce Bill, and do not occur in the English Act. My objection to the Commerce Bill is to the power given to a Minister of the Crown to determine what shall be the description attachable to the goods. The Minister may, in a proclamation, declare that, unless certain goods have applied to them a description of such character as is prescribed by the proclamation, these goods may be excluded from entering, or prevented from leaving the country. The conditions of trade will be governed, not by the honesty of the individual trader necessarily, or by the purity of the goods, or their commercial value, but by mere chance as to whether they comply with conditions laid down by somebody outside the trade altogether.

"There is the further danger that if the Act is capable of wide interpretation given to it by the regulations, those regulations cannot be annulled, but there is no doubt that if it were proposed to embody all the powers of the regulations in the Act itself the House would reject it. The nearest approach to this clause that I can find in legislation in England is in section 16 of the Merchandise Marks Act 1887. That certainly provides that the importation of articles may be prohibited under certain exceptional conditions. That is to say, if a foreign manufacturer sends goods to England bearing the trade mark of some English manufacturer or trader, he is committing a fraud on the English people.

It is well known that foreign manufacturers are in the habit of turning out goods which resemble articles of English make, but are of inferior quality. These goods are very often put on the market, and labelled or marked in such a way as to deceive the purchaser into the belief that they are of English production, and of high quality. For instance, I recently sent a messenger to one of the shops in Melbourne to purchase some English-cut tacks, but I was supplied with German goods of inferior quality, made of pewter, which could not be driven into even soft wood.

Mr. GROOM.—Was there a label on the packet to indicate that the tacks were made in Germany.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I did not see the original packet. Cut English tacks are preferred, because they are known to be of good quality, and thoroughly reliable.

Mr. GROOM.—Does not the honorable member think that goods of that kind should bear a true description, and that the persons who sell articles that are not properly marked should be punished?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Yes, I do; but the provision we are now discussing would not meet such cases. Mr. Wade is of opinion that—

If such a clause as that were passed by the Commonwealth Government all honest traders would welcome it.

I say that too—

But this is very different from the elastic Executive power which enables a Minister to lay down such conditions as he thinks fit, which may have the effect of absolutely paralyzing trade. Then, again, in carrying out the provisions of the English Act, special conditions are laid down as to the issue of warrants to search for goods in respect of which the offence has been committed. None of these safeguards is to be found in the Commerce Bill. The English Act does not deal with the quality, purity, or class or grade of goods. I see no reason why the Minister, perhaps in all good faith, may not lay down a standard of purity for any article. That standard may be of such a character that the trade cannot comply with it, or it may be that the local manufacturer can comply with the standard, yet it would be impossible for the importer to do so. In this way I see it is possible under this Bill, when the duty under the Customs has failed to exclude manufactures, to lay down a standard which the importer cannot comply with, and so drive that particular kind of trade away from the Commonwealth. In the United States I find nothing in the remotest degree approaching the drastic powers of this measure, and the detailed interference with the trade of each State. The useful provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887 have been adopted in South Australia, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the law is much the same with regard to the fraudulent use of trade marks and trade descriptions in New South Wales. We have all we want in this State to protect ourselves against commercial frauds of this character; but if a provision like section 16 of the English Act were passed by the Commonwealth we would have similar protection against fraudulent traders in other countries.

That is the opinion of the Attorney-General of New South Wales with regard to the Bill. Perhaps I may be permitted to quote a case bearing upon this question of quality which recently came under my notice. A friend of mine, who is engaged in a softgoods business in Melbourne, recently gave me some information with regard to the effect of the Tariff upon certain lines of goods. He represented that in some cases importers have to sell their goods at the same prices that they were able to obtain prior to the introduction of the Federal Tariff, and that, in order to overcome the difficulty arising from the increase in the duty, they had to make special arrangements with the manufacturers at home to supply them with an article of lower quality. He stated that the working men could not afford to pay more than 1s. per pair for socks. Prior to the introduction of the Tariff, importers were able to sell for 1s. per pair socks of excellent quality, but afterwards they had to ask the manufacturers to supply them with socks of a lower quality, which they could still sell at 1s. Therefore, the consumer is now obtaining an article of lower quality than that which was previously sold to him at the same price. The same remarks apply to other imports, and if it is desired to prevent deception of that kind, it appears to me that the remedy is to be applied, not by means of a measure of this kind, but by repealing the iniquitous Tariff, which invites traders to perpetrate frauds of the character referred to.

Mr. WILSON (Corangamite).—I am as anxious as is any honorable member that a measure should be passed to prevent adulteration, and to insure that goods shall be supplied to consumers under their proper description as to quality. Most of the honorable members who have preceded me have failed to appreciate the object of the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Angas. He showed clearly that his object was to improve the Bill by bringing it into line with existing legislation in Great Britain and South Australia, and thereby rendering it more valuable. The South Australian Act distinctly provides in Part 2—

“Trade description” means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect, as to the particular quantity, measure, gauge, or weight of any goods.

In that provision there is no mention of “quality” or “nature”; whereas in the Bill before us, the terms “nature, quality, purity, class, grade, and size” are employed. The South Australian Act is based upon Imperial legislation, from which the terms included in the Bill now before us were, after careful consideration, expressly excluded. Since the Imperial Act was brought into force, a number of judgments have been given by the English Court bearing upon the terms to which I have last referred, and the honorable and learned member for Angas desires to exclude from the Bill all words which would be difficult to define and might lead to serious litigation. This Bill will not prevent adulterated foods going into consumption. Under its provisions a man will still be at liberty to import adulterated goods, provided that he correctly describes them. He may introduce cardboard or imitation leather, as long as he describes it by its true name, and that material may still be used in the manufacture of loots and shoes, so that the Bill will really fail to carry out the object we have in view. Unless it is the intention of the Government to act in concert with the States in the administration of their Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, or other measures relating to adulterated foods which are in operation, children will continue, as at present, to be poisoned by deleterious compounds.

Mr. GROOM. — Will not the Bill deal with a lot of the tinned foods that are now coming in?

Mr. WILSON.—I do not think so.

Mr. GROOM.—They will have to be correctly described.

Mr. WILSON.—The Bill will have to be brought into line with the English Sale of Foods and Drugs Act in order to secure what we desire, for the Government have taken no power under it to obtain samples of various foods and to analyze them. I do not think any honorable member would oppose a Bill that would prevent a roguish manufacturer from putting poisonous compounds on the market. The Bill will not be effective.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If the Opposition will leave it alone they will find that it will be effective enough.

Mr. WILSON.—I fail to see that it will be effective. It is the duty of a Government to submit effective measures to the Parliament, and it is the business of an Opposition to show in what respect any measure is defective. I share the feeling of the honorable member for Boothby that the Bill does not provide for reasonable definitions in regard to imports and exports. While it gives the Minister wide powers that may be seriously abused, it does not afford him sufficient power to deal with many matters that ought to be dealt with under such a measure. The honorable member for Hindmarsh referred to the desirableness of prohibiting the importation of oleomargarine, butterine, and like products. I would remind him, however, that, under section 52 of the Customs Act 1901, the Minister has power, not only to prohibit exhausted and adulterated teas, but—

Oleomargarine, butterine, or any similar substitute for butter, unless coloured and branded as prescribed.

Under the same section—

All goods the importation of which may be prohibited by proclamation as well as—

All goods having thereon or therewith any false suggestion of any warranty guarantee or concern in the production or quality thereof by any persons, public officials, Government, or country, are prohibited. In moving the second reading of the Bill, the Minister read a list of various imports that might be brought under its provisions. Beer and apparel are the first two items on the list. It is probable that a man who is an authority on apparel may be also a good judge of beer, but he might not be able to say whether or not it contained deleterious compounds. We all know that beer is largely adulterated with drugs that are really dangerous to the consumer, and I should like to know how the Minister is going to deal with such importations without the assistance of an expert. Experts will have to be in attendance at every port to deal with these goods. Then, again, I should like to know how furniture, which is also included in the list, is likely to come under the Bill. If it is the intention of the Minister to carry out his promise to the deputation from the Chamber of Commerce which recently waited on him, and to confine the application of the Bill entirely to foodstuffs, honorable members will certainly assist him to that end.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—They are showing to-night what assistance they are prepared to give.

Mr. WILSON.—I do not think that the honorable gentleman has any reason to complain. I do not wish to delay the Committee in arriving at a decision, but I should certainly like to know whether it is the intention to apply the Bill to the full list of imports which he read. When the honorable member for Hindmarsh spoke of the necessity of preventing the importation of poisonous drugs, I presume that he meant that proprietary medicines should be examined, and that if they were found to contain poisons which were deleterious to the consumer, their importation should be prohibited. I think that all honorable members will agree with that contention, but, under the Bill, it will be impossible to deal with such goods. The Bill needs to be very carefully considered, and to receive more attention at the hands of honorable members than it is getting at present. I would remind the Committee that paragraph a of clause 3 will apply to exports as well as imports. In all the States, Government experts are employed to examine and grade various exports, but, although that is done, the exportation of inferior articles is not prohibited. I presume that the Minister would not interfere with that practice. For instance, under the system at present adopted in Victoria, butter is divided into three classes—creamery, dairy, and mixed, and all below the last-named quality is classed as pastry butter. Would the Minister avail himself of the provisions of the Bill to prevent the exportation, say, of pastry butter which is unfit for human consumption, except when used in the manufacture of pastry?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Certainly not, if it were correctly marked.

Mr. WILSON.—Am I to understand then that the Government is to take over the work of grading these products?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have no doubt that the Commonwealth Government will make an arrangement with the States.

Mr. WILSON.—Would it not be better for the Government of the Commonwealth to consult with the States Governments before we pass this Bill, so as to see how far they could come into line with them?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Afterwards, not before.

Mr. WILSON.—It is a very important matter to the producers. The States Governments do a considerable amount of grading already, but how far does the Commonwealth Government intend to go? Honorable members on both sides of the Chamber would like to know. We do not want to have any clashing of interests. There is, I admit, a great deal to be said for grading, though some producers object to it. The Government certainly will either have to provide their own experts, or to enter into an arrangement with the States; and are the States agreeable that the Commonwealth should take over the work of grading.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Or to lend their officers?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It does not seem to me, from what I have heard lately, that the States are agreeable to anything that the Commonwealth does.

Mr. WILSON. — Under those circumstances, it would surely be unwise for the Government to proceed with the Bill, as they do not know how far the States are willing to act with them.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I shall not attempt to reply to all the criticisms on my amendment, because some honorable members who are supporting the Government are giving admirable support to the effort which I am making to improve the Bill. I had two objects in view in moving the amendment. One was to secure uniformity; because we should, as far as possible, keep our legislation in these matters in line with English legislation, so as to get the benefit of English decisions. Apart from that, also, people engaged in trade throughout the British Empire should be able to know, without having to look at a multitude of statute-books, what the laws are. They should be able to infer from the laws in operation in England what the laws are likely to be in a British dependency. As a matter of fact, at the Colonial Conference of 1902, uniformity in respect of patents, copyrights, and other commercial matters was expressly referred to as being desirable, as will be seen from the report, which can be read in the Library. So that I am really acting from an Imperial point of view, as well as from the point of view of common sense, in urging that we should as far as possible—unless, of course, necessity is shown for a divergence—adhere to the lines initiated by the Imperial Government in legislation placed on the English statute-book. I also object to the word “quality” being inserted, because in no case in England is the word “quality” used; in fact the word was deliberately left out of the English legislation. Kerly on Trade Marks, after a reference to the Act of 1862, which was amended by the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887, says, on page 569:—

That Act did not, and the present Act does not, extend to descriptions of quality as apart from kind.

The author goes on to describe the Act, and remarks that it was extended to deal in general with—marks which filled the office of trade marks, to reach all false merchandise marks other than marks of quality.

These marks of quality were therefore deliberately left out because, as I have endeavoured to impress upon the Committee, the word “quality” is one which is very comprehensive in its significance. It is an abstract term, which does not suggest anything concrete. Hence it is capable of many shades of meaning, and can be used in such a variety of connotations that it would be almost impossible to secure convictions. For that reason the English Legislature, having had the advantage of the inquiries of Commissions, deliberately left out the word as being a dangerous one to employ. And if it is dangerous to use the word in England, where a man need not put the description on his goods, it must be doubly dangerous here, where a man has to put such a description on them as may be prescribed by the Minister. If he is in doubt in England he does not put a description on his goods. If he is in doubt here, he nevertheless has to put a description on them, because he cannot export or import unless he does so. It is not, as the English Act says, a description that is not "false in a material particular." We go beyond that, and say, "If it is likely to mislead," terms which are deliberately left out in England as being somewhat dangerous. "False in a material particular" is a term much less likely to cause difficulty than the term "likely to mislead in a material particular." And those words "likely to mislead" are placed in the latter part of the clause, emphasizing my contention that the addition of these words has made the definition—coupled with the penal clauses of the Bill—far more dangerous to honest importers and manufacturers; because they must describe and must not make a mistake. I think that honorable members will see that I have some reason for asking that the word "quality" should be left out, even if the Minister will not agree to limit its application. I do not know whether he quite went that length, but there was some indication of his intention to limit it to food products and patent medicines. If he will absolutely guarantee that he will simply schedule such articles as that, and not take power to proclaim other things as being within the scope of the Bill, I will agree to withdraw the amendment. But if he will not do that, I must decidedly object to intrusting a power of this sort to an administration which will be subject to the importunities of interested persons. It may be that in view of the tremendous category of goods covered by the Bill, importunities of all sorts will be employed, and will lead to a serious conflict of interests between importers and manufacturers. I am sure that the Committee sees the inexpediency of allowing such a power as this to be wielded by men who in all the circumstances of politics are not always infallible, or are not always possessed of a perfect sense of obligation to the Commonwealth. I would again point out to honorable members what may occur. Goods are not to be imported unless upon a description as regards their quality. Now, if the Minister desires to stop the importation of any goods, he can, under the Customs Act, simply proclaim them as not to be imported. As has been decided in America, the trade and commerce section allows that to be done. The Minister can, in that way, put an embargo upon commerce. He is empowered to issue a proclamation against the importation of particular goods without offering any reason. That such a wide power as this has hardly ever been enforced does not remove the fact that for cause shown he is authorized by the Act to proclaim against certain importations. That is an honest way of dealing with things—to proclaim only for specific cause, to say that they shall not be imported because they contain certain materials injurious to the public health. Suppose that under this Bill the Minister declares that a description of quality must be attached to certain goods, and those goods are imported. What has he to do? If he is brought by the importer into a court of justice, the difficulty of proof lies with the Government. The Minister will not want to face that difficulty. Why? Because, as I said before, the term "quality" is so very wide. It involves distinctions grading almost imperceptibly, as twilight does into dark. He will not risk a prosecution where the onus of proof is thrown upon him in that manner. The importer will say that the description is not false, and the Minister will not prosecute. The Bill will therefore prove to be a delusion to those who are supporting it. Because if it fails in a case of that kind, it must be a perfect delusion. Further, it will work a positive injury to our commerce, and to the operation of existing State laws. The State laws at present are fairly effective to cope with such cases, and to substitute Commonwealth administration, which is often far less effective, will work injury to all classes. For an administration which is fairly effective we shall be substituting an administration which is doubtful. What the Minister will do is this: He will lay an information under clause 8 of the Bill, and he will attempt to shift the burden from the holder of the goods—either the importer or the exporter — of having attached a false trade description; in other words, having put a description upon the goods which gives a false indication of their quality. Then see what position the Minister will be in. This measure, in conjunction with the Customs Act, will place him in this position—that alleging in an information that the description is false, is prima facie evidence that it is false unless the importer or the person who gets the goods—and who may not be the man who attaches the description to them—proves the contrary. Section 255 of the Customs Act contains this provision—

In every Customs prosecution the averment of the prosecutor or plaintiff contained in the information, declaration, or claim shall be deemed to be proved in the absence of proof to the contrary.

I say that, as a matter of administration, the Minister will not meet the challenge thrown out to him on the ground that he cannot prove the information that the goods are falsely described, and he will lay the burden of proof upon the importer of showing that they are not falsely described. That opens up a very serious prospect, and it shows the wisdom of the English legislation that penalizes a man for a false description of goods, but does not penalize him for a false description of quality. On page 570, Kerly on Trade Marks mentions adulteration under the heading of quality—

Adulteration or the sale of goods not of the nature or quality demanded or pretended is made a criminal offence by other statutes in many special instances.

Then he goes on to refer to the fact that the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, the administration of which is far more perfect than the administration of this Bill is likely to be by the Commonwealth, make it an offence to mix injurious ingredients with articles of food. The administration of this Bill cannot be so perfect, and will make the measure a delusion to those who support it, as instanced by the fact that the Government have never attempted to put an embargo on the importation of goods under the Customs Act, on the ground that they were not as described; the Minister knowing that the proposition is hardly capable of proof. If the Minister was challenged, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he could not sustain his allegation of a false description of quality. It would be impossible to do so. Under the circumstances, therefore, it would be far more expedient to leave the States to deal with these particular matters, which can be dealt with under the Food and Drugs Acts far more effectively than is likely to be the case under this measure. I repeat that I believe that honorable members will find that this Bill is an absolute delusion, and that so far from protecting the public it will injure them, because the administration will be a failure. And I ask the Committee whether importers are likely to describe bad goods as bad goods? Is a man likely to say that his butter is of a dubious quality, and that it will become rank in a short time? Not at all. If he has any doubt about the quality he will give himself the benefit of it, knowing the difficulty the Minister will be in as regards instituting a prosecution, and being aware that the intentions of the Act will be defeated. I hope, therefore, that the Committee will recognise that I am justified in what I have said as to this clause.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Amendment negatived.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—I move—

That the words, lines 29 and 30, "a Customs House entry relating to goods and," be left out.

I have no desire to ignore the decision of the Committee, as indicated by the division just taken, but, as I had already indicated that I should move the omission of these words, I now do so. It is a matter of common knowledge that these Customs House entries are usually passed by clerks, and for any omission or neglect the pains and penalties provided are most serious. The Minister of Trade and Customs is aware that the Chambers of Commerce were unanimous in desiring that this provision should not be made, and the suggestions of those bodies were, it will be admitted, offered with a desire to make the Bill effective. I may be told by the Minister that these are the words used in the English Merchandise Marks Act; but, as the honorable and learned member for Angas pointed out when he submitted the last amendment, there is really no analogy between the two provisions. The pains and penalties under the measure before us are immeasurably greater than those under the English Act. The other sub-clauses render it unnecessary that a Customs House entry shall be a trade description, and the position may be met by the Minister requiring a separate document, embodying facts within the knowledge of the principal of any firm desiring to pass goods. In the earlier stages the administration of the Customs Act caused considerable consternation amongst merchants throughout the Commonwealth in consequence of prosecutions being instituted, and explanations demanded, for any error or negligence on the part, it might be, of some junior clerk; and it is felt that if the clause be allowed to remain as it stands at present there may be a repetition of that trouble and inconvenience. The present Minister of Trade and Customs then recognised how harshly the administration of the Customs Act pressed on merchants, and he altered the practice. I appeal to the honorable gentleman now, in view of the fact that full particulars are provided for in the other sub-clauses, to accept the amendment which I have moved. It is unnecessary, in the ordinary day by day conduct of a merchant's business, to exercise a power which might be the means of possible misfortune to a firm. The amendment I have submitted may safely be supported by any honorable member who is in favour of the whole of the other provisions of the measure. In my opinion, this sub-clause, if not amended, will prove to be unworkable, and will create a sort of reign of terror amongst merchants; and that, I am sure, is not the object or intention of the Minister or the Government in introducing the Bill.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—I desire to point out, as I did the other night, that the English Merchandise Marks Act contains a provision similar in effect to that now under discussion.

Mr. GLYNN.—The two provisions are quite different in their working.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I shall refer to the reasons for the provision in the English Act later on. Section 1 of the English Merchandise Marks Act provides: That "a Customs House entry relating to imported goods" shall, for the purposes of the Act, "be deemed to be a trade description applied to the goods." That is practically the same as the provision which we have inserted in this Bill. It has been pointed out to me very strongly by the officers of the Department that the words which it is proposed to omit are absolutely necessary for the proper administration of the Act.

Mr. KENNEDY.—This is the only means by which these particulars can be obtained.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is so. A good deal of what has been said about the Bill not being as stringent as it might be would be effective if it were not for this very provision. The section was inserted in the English Act in consequence of a report by a Royal Commission which investigated the subject. After referring to the inclusion in the English Act of the provision I have read, the report I have on the subject says—

This fact is very important, and in itself alone it is sufficient reason for the inclusion in the Commerce Bill, which is based so largely upon the British Act, and the objection brought forward to the Commerce Bill does not extend to controverting the wisdom of the British law which prevails so largely in the various parts of the British Empire.

The reason for its inclusion becomes still stronger when we consider how it came to be adopted in the British Act. Its adoption in England was the result of a recommendation by the Committee of the British Parliament in 1800, which reported as follows:—"The evidence given before your Committee was, in their opinion, conclusive proof that goods (notably articles of consumption) come into this country in large quantities in an adulterated form, but cannot, according to the evidence given by the Customs authorities, be detained under section 3 (d) and (n) of the M. M. A., because in most instances they bear no trade description as defined by sections 3 and 5 of the said Act."

What I want is to have the trade description brought in here in the way in which this Committee reported that it should be dealt with in the Imperial Merchandise Marks Act. The Committee further reported—

Your Committee are of opinion that much harm is being done to legitimate trade by the impunity with which spurious articles are introduced into this country. They therefore propose that the Act should be amended by making the Customs "entry," which must bear a description of the goods imported, a "trade description" within the meaning of the Act. The adoption of this amendment would, in the opinion of your Committee, give the Customs power to detain goods, the "trade description" of which is false as to the materials of which they are composed.

It was on that report that the provision I have read was inserted in the English Act, and on that report I desire that these words should be left in this Bill. I ask honorable members not to impair the effectiveness of the measure, as it would be impaired by the omission of these words. I can well understand that those who desire to oppose the Bill should wish to make it as weak as possible. A great deal that has been said to-night as to the impotency of the Customs officers to deal with persons importing anything impure, or anything fraudulently marked, is of no effect whatever. I ask the Committee not to consent to the amendment.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney)—The Minister of Trade and Customs objects to the amendment on the ground that certain honorable members desire to destroy this measure.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have no wish to be interpreted in that way. What I said was that the amendment would weaken the measure.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I at once accept the honorable gentleman's denial. I can assure the Committee that any provision that is necessary to detect fraud will find support on this side. So far from desiring to see goods introduced under a false trade description, during the whole of my mercantile career I have had attached to invoices, under a system inaugurated by the honorable member for Mernda, a supporter of the Government, a clause guaranteeing that goods sold under those invoices are of the exact character of the invoiced and labelled description, and that the firm would be responsible for the purity of the goods sold under that guarantee. That is a self-imposed Adulteration Act, and personally I should like to see other merchants adopt the same course.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Minister desires to make all merchants like the honorable gentleman.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — It is quite true, as stated in the report read by the Minister, that the English Act does not provide for a trade description, and in that lies the difference between it and this Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It can be dealt with in clause 7 or clause 10.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Minister, under this clause, can insist on a trade description being placed on goods.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If it is carried.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If it is carried. The reason for the inclusion of the Customs entry in the English Act was that there was no other trade description compulsory under that Act. Consequently, they had to enact that this, the only description provided for, must be accurate. I do not object to insisting on general accuracy in an entry form; but the Minister might insist on a number of the items of information set out in clause 3 with reference to number, quality, place of origin, manufacturer or producer of goods, person by whom they are selected, and so on, being placed in a trade description, which might be a label or an invoice or a Customs entry; but if he is going to insist that they shall all be placed in a Customs entry, it will become a very difficult and almost impossible task to pass entries for any large quantity of goods. One would have to enter into a long description, altogether irrelevant to any Customs entry, giving all details as to ingredients, source of origin, and so on, of each line of goods. That would make a Customs entry a tremendous document. Without pressing the matter too much at the present time, the Minister might consider whether he cannot propose something which would meet that difficulty. He has every security in being able to insist on a trade description apart from a Customs entry. If the Customs entry is to be made a trade description, and must consequently contain all the details which the Minister is entitled to stipulate shall be given in a trade description, it will be a very difficult document to prepare. These entries are sufficiently lengthy at present, but this provision, if carried out, might require, in the case of large lines of goods, that they should be tremendous catalogues.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I had a conversation with the Comptroller-General of Customs on that point, and he does not think that there would be the least trouble or any difficulty in connexion with the matter.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — I quite admit that if the full trade description is not insisted on in the entry it might not be troublesome, but power is taken to make the description in a Customs entry as minute and detailed as any other description attached to the goods. That may be necessary under the English Act, which does not provide for any other description. But in this measure, where we do provide for a full and complete description in another way, I do not see why we should provide for it also in the Customs entry. Might I remind the Minister that under paragraph d of section 234 of the Customs Act it is provided that "No person shall make any entry which is false in any particular," so that there is security under the Customs Act as regards falsity. The giving of detailed information in the Customs entry would afford no protection to the consumer, nor is there any necessity for it when there is power to see that the full and complete description is given on the label or invoice. That is the difficulty to which I direct the attention of the Minister in supporting the amendment moved by the honorable member for Koo-yong.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—The criticism of the honorable member for North Sydney bears on clause 7 rather than on clause 3.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON. — The two clauses must be read together.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I admit that they must be considered together. At the same time, I think that when we come to clause 7, the honorable gentleman will be able to move an amendment which will achieve his purpose, and which will be well worthy of consideration.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am willing to act on that suggestion.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The object of including a Customs entry under the head of trade description is to assist the prosecution of fraud.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is the object.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I think that those who framed the clause hardly realized that the Minister, in having regulations made, might say, "I shall compel importers to include details in Customs entries which they do not usually contain." I do not think it is intended to make Customs entries any more formidable and detailed documents than they are at present. The honorable member for North Sydney never speaks beside the point, but always in a manner which commands the attention of honorable members, and I respectfully suggest that he might allow this clause to pass. The honorable gentleman will admit that Customs entries are not trade descriptions ordinarily, and if there is a false statement in a Customs entry the person responsible for it should be liable to prosecution.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am not against that, so long as a detailed description is not required in a Customs entry.

Mr. HIGGINS.—A modification of clause 7 might be suggested, and I should be inclined to support it, to give effect to what the honorable gentleman desires, but I hope that we shall all be prepared to assist any Administration to prosecute in cases of clear guilt. It is very difficult to prove that a trade description is false, and we must give the Customs officers full power to deal with such matters. If there is dishonesty, let us punish it. If, in a Customs entry, a man calls something pure milk, or pure wool, which is not pure milk or pure wool, and if, for instance, he says that certain gold is 18 carat gold, when it is not, he should be liable to the penalties proposed in this Bill. The experience of the British Customs is that you can in no way reach the prosecution of an offender so effectually as by insisting that every description in a Customs entry shall be true. One honorable member has said, to my surprise, that these Customs entries are made by boys. It is quite true that they are left too much to boys. It is our business to see to it that every entry put before the Customs authorities for the purpose of duty or any other purpose shall be carefully made out, and shall be true. I am personally aware that one of the most frequent means of the evasion of duty is the practice adopted of trusting the making of Customs entries to irresponsible persons, or to persons who do not know the business. I ask those who have any experience in these matters to corroborate me in that statement. They know it is done commonly. The importers of goods allow entries to be passed by boys, who, when they come for advice, are told to "put in so and so." Then when they are faced with a falsehood they say, "Oh, it was that boy. He did not understand." I feel that we should excuse nothing in a Customs entry when the plea is that the person to whom the making of it was intrusted was incapable of properly performing the task.

Mr. KNOX (Kooyong).—I am in accord with the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and with the Minister himself, in thinking that the penalties of the Bill should apply to any attempt to make an entry which would impose on the Customs, or which contained a fraudulent representation of the nature of the goods to which it referred. I do not desire to relieve the importer of the responsibility of exercising proper care in seeing that the right trade description is given. If he allows his clerk or office boy to give a fraudulent description, he should be liable to the penalty attaching to the making of a false description. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, however, has put forward the valuable suggestion that the object which I had in view in moving the amendment might be better met by an amendment in clause 7, and I therefore beg leave to withdraw my amendment, adding that I do not desire that there shall be room for the introduction of fraudulent methods.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—It seems to me that if the Customs entry is to contain all the particulars set out in paragraphs a to f, it will take a considerable time, and entail considerable trouble, to make. I think that the end in view will be met by requiring a trade description containing all these particulars to be placed on the tins or other packages containing imports. To duplicate this information on the Customs entry is only to entail additional and useless labour on our merchants. I do not think that the merchants of the Commonwealth are so void of principle and of honour as the measure would indicate. I know that a large number of them are honorable men, and I am ready to protect all honorable men from the unfair competition of dishonorable men. I am also willing to protect the consumer, by insisting that all goods brought into the country shall have affixed to them proper trade descriptions. The Merchandise Marks Act of Great Britain differs from the Bill in that it deals only with imports, whereas the Bill deals with both imports and exports. If it dealt merely with imports, the task of the Legislature would be easier. Although I think that it would be simpler to amend this clause than to amend clause 7, I do not object to the withdrawal of the amendment, because I do not wish to set my opinion against that of the honorable and learned member for North Sydney, who has had such a long experience in mercantile matters. We should, however, not overload the Bill. In passing legislation of this kind, we are often putting into motion forces of which we do not know what the effect will be, and just as some honorable members believe that there is ground for distrusting our merchants, I have a strong feeling that the officers of the Customs Department are not to be trusted with too much power, because, being brought up in an atmosphere of suspicion, they are likely to be tyrannical, and their conduct in many cases has indicated that disposition.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—I move—

That the words "or omitted therefrom," line 38, be left out.

I could understand the Customs officials wishing to penalize anything in the nature of a false trade description, and I think that it is reasonable that a man should be punished for putting on his goods any description liable to mislead. But it is going much further than that to say that persons shall be punished for omitting something from a description.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Fraudulently omitting.

Mr. KELLY.—The Minister, unfortunately, is to be the only judge as to what constitutes fraudulent omission. A trade description is defined to mean any description as to the nature, number, quantity, quality, purity, class, grade, measure, gauge, size, or weight of the goods, and the other particulars set out in paragraphs b to f, and a false trade description means any false statement in regard to any of these particulars, or any omission therefrom. I cannot see what circumstances the words "or omitted therefrom" are intended to meet.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—It seems to me, for reasons which have been very amply given to the Committee by the honorable member for North Sydney, that the Customs entry ought not to contain particulars which are not required by the Customs Act. It would certainly be very harsh to require that all the particulars required in a trade description should be set forth in the Customs entry relating to any goods. That cannot be the intention. What is done in England, and might be done here, is to prevent false statements being made in the usual form of the Customs entry. If the Minister will accept an amendment in that direction, I think that we might do what is necessary, by inserting after the word "entry," line 28, the words "limited to the particulars prescribed by the Customs Act 1901, or the regulations thereunder."

The CHAIRMAN.—It is not competent for the honorable and learned member to move that amendment, since there is already an amendment before the Chair.

Mr. KELLY.—I am prepared to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is not so difficult to deal with the matter here as to deal with it in clause 7.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I prefer to deal with it in clause 7, so that I may discuss the question with my experts.

Mr. KELLY.—Will the Minister re-submit this clause if it be found that the matter cannot be dealt with so conveniently in clause 7?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—What I wish to do in the first instance, is to link this measure with the Customs Act, and, as was suggested by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, it may be that an amendment can be framed which will allow that to be done without requiring too elaborate a trade description to be inserted in the Customs entry. I do not desire that any attempt should be made to effect the honorable member's object by amending this particular clause. Before we reach clause 7, I shall have obtained further technical information from the Comptroller-General of Customs as to whether it would be possible to meet the desire of the honorable member for Kooyong without weakening the intention of the Bill. If I can agree to the amendment with safety, and the honorable member's object cannot be achieved by amending clause 7 or 8, I shall be quite willing to recommit the clause now under discussion. The words now proposed to be omitted were deliberately inserted with a view to giving the Minister the fullest power to deal with cases of fraud, and I desire to avoid any amendment that will weaken that power.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I objected to the withdrawal of the amendment, because I did not see how the object of the honorable member for Kooyong could be achieved by amending clause 7. If the amendment were accepted it would restrict the Customs entry to the statement of the particulars that are usually filed in such entries, and I think it is desirable to do that.

Mr. KELLY.—Would the Minister kindly make some statement with regard to the question I have raised?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—I do not feel disposed to agree to the proposal of the honorable member, because numerous cases might arise in which an exporter or an importer would deliberately omit a necessary trade description. A false trade description is one which is false "by reason of anything contained therein or omitted therefrom." We should have the power to punish an importer or an exporter who, by the omission of essential particulars, practically gives a fraudulent description.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—There would not be so much objection to this provision if the importer or the exporter had an opportunity to demand a fair and judicial examination into his conduct. The Star Chamber in England was abolished years ago, and we should not establish any such institution here.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Who squealed out for a Star Chamber when importers were hauled up before the Courts on charges of fraud?

Mr. LONSDALE.—Those who are charged with fraud upon the Customs are more likely to obtain justice in the Law Courts than if they are tried by persons who have already prejudged them. Under the provisions of the Bill, the very officials who have preferred charges will be called upon to try the accused persons, and I would ask the honorable member whether he would like to have his conduct inquired into by a person who was prosecuting him.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The importers are satisfied with the present arrangement for inquiries into alleged breaches of the Customs Act.

Mr. LONSDALE.—They are not satisfied. The importers were not satisfied with the course adopted in the harvester case. They asked to be permitted to go before the Court, and reasonably so, because no man with any sense of justice would require that a man should be tried by the very officers who had declared him to be guilty of fraud. Under the Bill as it now stands those who are alleged to be guilty of fraud will be entirely at the mercy of the Minister and his officials, and I decline to confer upon the Customs authorities the powers which are now contemplated. If we cannot trust the Courts, let us appoint other judges. We should carefully guard against wrong being done to any citizen. I have no personal friends among the importers any more than other honorable members have, but I contend that we should be careful that justice is done to every member of the community. If it is provided that those who consider that they are aggrieved by any action of the Customs authorities can appeal to a judicial tribunal, I shall have no objection to the provision as it stands in the Bill.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir). — It seems like a romance to hear the honorable member complaining about a Star Chamber.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It is nothing else.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am delighted to hear it. If there was one section of the community that clamoured for the adoption of the Star Chamber process in connexion with Customs inquiries at the time when importers were being hauled before the Courts, it was the section which is now fighting the Bill. Was not the present mode of procedure adopted at the request of importers who were being charged in the Law Courts with frauds upon the Customs?

Mr. LONSDALE. — Their request should not have been granted.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I was delighted when importers and others who were guilty of frauds upon the Customs were taken before the Law Courts, and I was one of those who objected most strenuously to the procedure now being followed. If the honorable member will propose that instead of the Customs authorities being the final arbiters in cases of alleged fraud, the accused persons should be taken before a judicial tribunal, I shall support him. I cannot see any justification for the alteration proposed by the honorable member for Wentworth. The words which he proposes to omit are necessary for the proper definition of a false trade description. My only objection is that they are not quite strong enough, and I prefer that the word "liable" should be substituted for the word "likely." I can conceive that some difference of opinion might exist as to what was "likely to mislead"; but the same divergence of view would not be possible in regard to the word "liable."

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—I think that the Minister has mistaken my object. The omission of the words which I have suggested should be excised would do no harm, but, on the other hand, would improve the clause. I would point out that "trade description" relates, among other things, to the quality of an article, and any omission in that regard might be construed by the Minister as a false trade description. For instance, suppose that a quantity of salt butter were imported, and the word "salt" was not included in the trade description—

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — Or that the importer did not apply any description to it.

Mr. KELLY.—But he would be compelled to apply a trade description.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—He might call it butter, but not bad butter.

Mr. KELLY.—The importer would have to apply a trade description, and if that description were false he might be prosecuted, apart altogether from any provision containing the words which I propose to omit. It appears to me that it would be absurd to empower the Minister to punish a man for applying a false description merely because of some omission on his part. Surely the only person who could say that he had been deceived by such an omission in the description would be the consumer of the article. I do not think the Minister should be intrusted with any such power as that proposed to be conferred. He would be placed in a most serious position, and, indeed, it is largely on his account that I am suggesting the amendment.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume—Minister of Trade and Customs).—I should like to point out to the honorable member, in the first place, that it is not the Minister, but the officers of his Department, who will be called upon to deal with this matter. It is only in the case of an appeal that the Minister will take action.

Mr. KELLY.—Does the Minister direct his officers, or are they irresponsible?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—They are not irresponsible, but in matters arising under this Bill they are not likely to receive any direct instructions from the Minister.

Mr. KELLY.—No measure can prevent a Minister from controlling the officers of his Department.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Minister will have very little control over his officers in this regard, except when an appeal is made to him. If the honorable member turns to clause 10, he will find that—

Subject to the regulations the Comptroller-General, or on appeal from him the Minister, may permit any goods which are liable to be or have been seized as forfeited under this section to be delivered to the owner or exporter. . . .

It is only in such a case that the Minister will take action. As to the statement made by the honorable member regarding the possibility of fraud being committed by the omission of certain words from a description of goods, I would point out that, if, for instance, the shoddy boots exhibited by the honorable member for Darling were simply described as "men's boots," or "children's boots," as the case might be, and no reference were made to the fact that they were constructed partly of paper or cardboard, that would be a fraud, provided that the omission were deliberate. It is to meet such cases that it is necessary to have a provision of this kind in the Bill.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—The Minister's explanation raises a completely new position. Under the clause, as it stands, imitation leather could be imported as piece goods, and made up locally into boots, which could then be sold as leather boots. A fraud could thus be perpetrated on the consumers of the Commonwealth. The retention of these words will therefore lead to the institution of a new industry in Australia—to the establishment of factories from which the poor people of the country will be supplied with articles of a "brum-magem" nature.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — The States will look after that.

Mr. KELLY.—Why do anything which will afterwards put the States in the position of having "to look after that"?

Mr. LONSDALE (New England). — From an interjection made by the honorable member for Moira, whilst I was speaking, I was led to infer that he favoured the Star Chamber inquiries to which I was objecting. I find, however, that he does not favour such proceedings, and that what he wished to convey was that the importers favoured such a system of dealing with frauds on the revenue. I realise that there may be some trifling cases with which it might be permissible to deal in this way, but I hold that any serious fraud should be dealt with judicially, and in an open way. The fact of the public hearing of such a case would in itself be a greater punishment, and would have a stronger deterrent effect, than would the penalties for which provision is made. The Bill ought to contain a provision for an appeal to a judicial authority. If the Minister and his officers are satisfied that they are acting rightly they should have no objection to an appeal from their decisions to a judicial authority. Where the punishment imposed is the result of an omission on the part of a trader, the latter should have a right to show that the omission was not fraudulent, and a judicial authority should then be able to deal with the case. A man charged with having given a false description of his goods should be allowed to appeal from the decision of the person who really lays the charge against him and prosecutes him. No one should object to that proposition. I shall ask one of the legal members of the Committee who agrees with me to draft an amendment in that direction, and I shall be prepared to move it.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—I rise this time really in the interests of the honorable member for Moira, who, I understand, is rather concerned about the use of the words "likely to mislead." The honorable member thinks that it is rather an awkward phrase, and I agree with him that the word "liable" would be preferable to "likely." I move—

That the word "likely," line 39, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "liable."

Mr. GLYNN (Angas). — As has been mentioned by the honorable member for Kooyong, it would be futile to attempt to amend this clause, in view of the decision of the Committee on a previous amendment, although I should attempt to amend several of the paragraphs if I did not think it would be a waste of time to do so. Several words have been inserted in these paragraphs that are not in the Imperial Act, and the definition of "false trade description" makes the clause much more harassing than it would otherwise be. There is a whole line in COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA.

RULINGS—

Senate:

President, The.

Address-in-Reply.—Unless the Standing Orders be suspended, no business other than what is formal in character can be entered upon before the Address-in-Reply has been adopted, 171

Adjournment of debate cannot be moved by a senator who has spoken to the question, 538, 542

Amendments.—An amendment to a later part of a question precludes a senator from moving to amend an earlier part, 3449
An amendment must be put before the mover of the original motion replies, 456

An amendment should be put in such a form as, if rejected, not to prevent another senator's amendment from being moved, 3452

The amendment of Senator Pulsford to the motion concerning the grant of Home Rule to Ireland is not a direct negative, 3757

An amendment cannot be moved by a senator who has previously spoken to the main question, 3801

A senator is perfectly justified in moving two separate amendments to a motion before the Senate, 5577

Where an amendment is a negative of only part of the motion it is not out of order, 5649-50

An amendment to insert a new clause in an agreement must be disposed of before a senator can move to add a proviso to the motion for its ratification, 6304

A senator who has seconded a motion cannot move an amendment thereto, 7447

Anticipating Discussion.—The discussion of a question on a motion for adjournment, ought not to prevent the question from being debated again on a notice of motion already given, 1493, or to be given, 1494

A senator cannot anticipate the discussion on a notice of motion, 2363, 2647; or a Bill, 6028-37

A senator cannot block the consideration of a subject by putting a notice of motion on the paper, and postponing it; once a motion on that subject has been moved it can be proceeded with, 5630

Bills.—The Senate can entertain a motion for resuming the consideration of any Bill which was interrupted by prorogation in previous session of the same Parliament, 193, 309

An amendment to refer a Bill to a Select Committee can only be moved after the second reading has taken place, 1290

The effect of a vote not to further consider a Bill until certain evidence is tabled is that the Bill will only be superseded and not necessarily dropped, 1327

The first reading of a Bill cannot be moved after 10.30 p.m., 1327

An amendment, designed to express the opinion of the Senate on a subject, cannot be moved to the question for the second reading of a Bill, 2347

An instruction to the Committee on a Bill must be permissive in its terms, and relevant to its subject-matter, 3348. It is an original motion, of which notice has to be given, and it can be moved directly after the second reading of the Bill, 5220

An amendment must not be foreign to the purpose of a Bill when it was read the second time, 4036, 4098, 4135, 4202, 4261

Any amendment relative to electoral machinery can be moved to a Bill to alter electoral machinery, 4135

Any amendment relevant to the subject-matter of an amending Bill—whether it does or does not contain a new principle, or whether it does or does not refer to a section in the Act proposed to be amended by the Bill—can be moved, 4203

An amendment to a Bill must be relevant to its subject-matter: the test is not the title, but the subject-matter of the Bill, 5004

The Trade Marks Bill should be treated as a lapsed Bill, 6259, 6377

Business of Senate.—A senator in charge of any business has always the right to ask the Senate to re-arrange it on the notice paper, 1530, 2244

A senator cannot leave the Chamber after attention has been drawn to the want of a quorum, 2909

RULINGS—President, The—continued.

The time allowed for the consideration of private business cannot be exceeded unless the sessional order be suspended, 3212

A message from the other House cannot be considered at same sitting, except by leave, 6258

Debate.—When a reserved ruling on a point of order is about to be given, the discussion cannot be re-opened, 309

On a motion that during the session senators should not absent themselves to sit on a Royal Commission, it is not permissible to discuss the proceedings of the Tariff Commission, except in so far as they bear on the abstract question, 428, 458, or anomalies in the Tariff, 427, or the question of free-trade or protection, 450

The speech of a senator must be relevant to the question, 447, 528-31, 539, 543-6, 977, 1162-4, 1285-8, 1302, 1319, 1325-6, 1387, 2361, 3201, 3330, 3672, 3689, 3872, 3997, 4105, 5119, 5132, 5235, 6038-40, 6540, 6655, 6916-7, 6922-5, 6934, 6941, 6952, 7052, 7067, 7072, 7186, 7451; but a brief reference to an extraneous question is permitted, 1286

A senator's disclaimer should be accepted, 544

Personal allusions are undesirable, 539, 544

When a motion is submitted that a paper be printed, the discussion ought to be directed to the desirability or otherwise of that course being taken, 1158

The Senate is not debarred by the Public Service Act from discussing the classification scheme, 1160

When leave is asked for, it ought not to be discussed; it must be given without a dissentient voice, 1161

A senator ought not to notice irrelevant interjections, 1302; but where one senator has been permitted to wander from the subject to some extent, the senator who is replying to such remarks ought to be as brief as possible, 3337

A senator will not be prevented by the Chair from replying to an irrelevant statement, 7065

On the first reading of a Supply Bill a senator can reply to almost any matter, but he cannot discuss the advisability, or otherwise, of repealing an Act of Parliament, 2801

On the second reading of a Supply Bill, a senator cannot discuss any question not relevant to an item therein, 1411-6. The policy of the Government as to the Defence Forces ought not to be debated, 1415

Although on the first reading of the Appropriation Bill a senator is entitled to discuss matters not relevant to its subject-matter, still the exercise of that freedom is subject to other rules of the Senate, 5264, 5442. Strictly speaking, it is out of order to allude to a Bill on the notice-paper of the other House; but an allusion to the Bill in general terms may be made, 5264. No reference can be made to an item in the Labour platform in a State, 5442

On the second reading of the Appropriation Bill a senator ought not to discuss any question which is not relevant to its subject-matter; he is free to discuss any item

- expenditure mentioned in the schedule, 5534-49; but not the question of imposing taxation, 5550
- The details of a Supplementary Appropriation Bill ought to be considered in Committee, 7346
- On a motion to dissent from a ruling a senator should be allowed unusual latitude, 4200, 4262
- It is irregular for a senator to repeat arguments in the same speech, though not at different stages of a Bill, 5144
- In discussing a motion which suggests that the Commonwealth should undertake a work in connexion with the sugar industry, an argument as to the way in which sugar-cane can best be grown is relevant, 5250
- Irrelevant matters may be discussed on the motion to close a sitting, 7084
- Divisions.*—A senator is not entitled to call for a division unless he is in the chamber when the question is put, 456
- Pairs are not recognised, 4859, 7083
- Formal Motions.*—Only certain motions can be considered as formal, 187
- A senator may ask a question concerning a formal motion, but he cannot discuss its terms, 2998
- One dissentient voice prevents a motion from being taken as formal, 3330
- Instructions.*—It is very difficult to say what instructions can be given to a Committee. Instructions which may be given to Select Committees are quite different in their nature from those which may be given to a Committee of the whole Senate, 5220
- Interruptions.*—A senator is entitled to be heard when he is speaking, 19, 4371, 4716, 5127, 5444, 6688-9, 6916
- Interjections ought not to be made after they have been objected to by the speaker, 543; or by the Chair, 5132-5
- When the President is giving a ruling, no other senator should speak, 2248, 6541-2
- A senator may say "Hear, hear," but, strictly speaking, all interjections are out of order, 4371
- A senator ought not to be led away from the question by interjections, 5132, 5235, 6687; or to make irrelevant interjections, 5553
- Language, Parliamentary.*—It is in order—to state facts, 520 to say that personal remarks concerning a senator bring discredit on the Senate, 539; that a motion for adjournment is an abuse of the standing order, 6649
- "Paltry excuse" is not a very nice expression to use, 3998
- Language, Unparliamentary.*—It is not in order to reflect on Parliament, 21; or on a Select Committee of the Senate, 2246; or on the action of the Senate; or on an Act of Parliament, except when moving for its repeal, 2801, 2808; or on the other chamber, 5128; or its members, 7451
- to speak of Mr. Deakin as a political jelly-fish, 25; or of the Premier of New South Wales as a bandit or highway robber, 6661

RULINGS—President, The—continued.

- Language, Unparliamentary (continued).*—It is not in order—to impute improper motives, 520; or motives, 2768
to describe the language of a senator as horrible, 544; or as disgraceful, 6690 to ascribe to a senator untruth, 544-5, 3340, 6297, 6961; or cowardice, 1278; or hypocrisy, 1728 to describe the action of a Bill's opponents as a deliberate conspiracy, 1271; or an amendment as a subterfuge, 1289, 1325; or a Select Committee as a packed jury, 2246; or the conduct of a State Governor as criminal, 3451; or the statement of a senator as a miserable subterfuge, 5125; or as a lie, 6928 to say that a senator probably holds a brief, 2248 to tell a senator to hold his tongue, 2248 to accuse the Imperial or Commonwealth Government of conniving, 2768 to stigmatize an Act of Parliament as unfair, unmanly, un-English, or ungenerous, 2801; or as disgraceful, 2808; or as practically a fraud, 5258
to attack a member of the other House, 5560
- When a senator is asked to withdraw a statement the withdrawal should be made instantly, and without argument or qualification, or impertinent remarks, 6961
- Ministerial Statement.*—If the Standing Orders be suspended a Ministerial statement may be made before the Address-in-Reply has been adopted, 170
- Motions.*—An objection to a notice of motion being given by leave cannot be withdrawn after the adjournment of the Senate has been moved, 1168
- By leave a Minister may give notice of a motion at an unusual time, 1327
- A notice of motion on the paper is the property of the senator in whose name it stands, and at his request, and on his behalf, it may be postponed, or moved, by another senator, otherwise it will lapse, 2244-5
- A notice of motion ought not to appear on the notice-paper if it contravenes the standing order which forbids the anticipation of the debate on a question, 2647
- A senator is not required to specify a date when he gives a contingent notice of motion, 2826
- A motion for leave of absence to a senator on account of urgent public business is strictly in order, and has priority over other motions, 3330
- A motion in the possession of the Senate cannot be amended by its mover, except by leave, 4565
- Any paragraphs of a motion which are contrary to a decision of the Senate in the same session cannot be moved until its resolution be rescinded, 6389
- Under standing order 104 a senator is required to give at least one day's notice of the specific motion which he intends to move on a certain date, 6376, 6382; but on that date he can ask leave of the Senate to move a motion, 6383; and the leave must be accorded unanimously, 6384

RULINGS—President, The—continued.

According to the Standing Orders, "notice" means notice for another day, 7449

A motion to which a senator has spoken, but which he has not moved, must be withdrawn, 7455

Motion for Adjournment—The four senators who rise to support a formal motion for adjournment are the judges as to whether its subject-matter is one of urgency or not, 5117

Papers.—Whenever any papers are tabled, any senator may move that they be printed, 15
A return ought to be obtained by means of a motion, and not a question, 140

The evidence taken by a Select Committee in previous session may be tabled, but it will not be included in sessional papers unless it is ordered to be printed, 538

The Printing Committee cannot say that a paper, already printed for the House of Representatives, or ordered by the Senate to be printed, shall not be printed, 2147

Personal Explanations.—If a senator is misrepresented by the speaker, at the close of the speech, he may ask leave to make a personal explanation, 433

A senator can only state in what manner his speech or action has been misunderstood, 459; or misrepresented, 2472; he cannot renew the debate on main question or discuss the accuracy of any statement by another senator, 460; or the conduct of any senators, 5529

The leave of the Senate must be obtained by a senator to make a personal explanation, 516

A personal explanation is not debatable, 2472; and should not be argumentative, 5724

The conduct of the business of the Senate is not a matter for a personal explanation, 5530

Strictly speaking, a personal explanation cannot arise out of an explanation by a senator, 5531

Petitions.—A petition is not out of order if it contains an allegation which, in a senator's opinion, is incorrect, 419

Points of Order.—It is not a duty of the Chair to interpret the provisions of the Constitution unless the conduct of business renders it absolutely necessary so to do, 310, 6541

The question whether a method is a desirable one to pursue is not a point of order, 1494

It is not the duty of the Chair to rule on a proposal to be made in Committee: that is a matter for the Chairman to consider, 3343

It is not the duty of the Chairman of Committees or the President to interpret the Standing Orders of the other House, and to say whether or not it has properly inserted certain clauses in a Senate Bill, 6542

Privilege.—The delivery of speeches on political matters by the Governor-General is a matter of public policy, and not a breach of the privileges of the Senate, 2997

Questions without notice.—A senator may state why he asks a question without notice, but the question cannot be argued by the senator, 6, 514, 1268, 3437, 4452, 7313; or by the Minister, 515

RULINGS—President, The—continued.

A question arising out of the answer to a question, upon notice, may be asked without notice, 1492; but it ought not to reflect on a senator, 4195; or to be argued, 5723, 6897-8; and the answer cannot be debated, 2243

One question should be answered by the Minister before he is questioned on the subject by another senator, 4338

Questions can only be asked of private senators concerning matters of which they have charge, 5117

The time for a senator to ask a question is before the business of the day is commenced, and not on the motion to adjourn the Senate, 6973

Questions upon notice.—One senator can request another to ask for the postponement of a question, otherwise it must lapse, 142

Notice of a question cannot be given after questions have been called on, 169, 1270, 2648

In answering a question, it is out of order to make a speech, 284, or adduce any argument, 951

The answer to a question must be printed on the records, 951

The terms of a question are subject to revision before it is printed on the notice-paper, 1053, 1268

An answer to a question cannot be forced, 3858

Quotations and References.—It is not in order—to read an extract reflecting on Parliament, 21 to quote or refer to newspaper comments on debates in the Senate, 1274 to refer to a former debate of the session, 2191, 3859, 5534, 6699, 6938, 6961; except on a motion to dissent from a ruling, 4200; or to pairs, 3870

to quote from any debate in another place, 5540 to read from a debate of same session in another place, 6674

A senator may not read his speech, but he can read an extract or a statement made to him; and a Minister may read a statement of the decision of the Ministry as to their policy, 1734

A senator can always quote outside opinions for what they are worth, 3194; or read a departmental report of a case, 6906

On a motion to discuss the conduct of the Government on a Bill before it was reported the mover may refer to a debate on the Bill in Committee; but he cannot discuss what took place in another place in connexion with a clause, or the Bill itself, 5119. A senator may refer to the proceedings on the Bill in another place, but not to a debate, 5126.

A reference to the possibility of a Bill coming from another place is permissible, 7084.

On a motion to adopt the report on a Bill a senator cannot go into the history of the Government, but he may refer to opinions expressed by its head, 5143

The discussions on all the stages of a Bill are considered as one debate, and a speech at a previous stage may be referred to, 30

On the first reading of the Appropriation Bill a senator will not be prevented by the Chair from alluding in general terms to a Bill on the notice-paper of the other House, but he ought not to allude to its details, 5264

On the second reading of a Bill a senator ought not to discuss a Bill which has been passed, though it can be referred to, 6922; a senator must not discuss the Bill or allude to the debate thereon, 6938

The substitution of "another place" for "the House of Representatives" does not permit a senator to refer to a debate of same session in that House, 7084

Right of Speech.—A senator cannot speak unless there is a motion before the Chair, 419, or after the question has been put, 546

The right of reply cannot be exercised while an amendment to a motion is pending, 455

On a formal motion for adjournment a senator cannot exceed the allotted time, 529, 531, 5127, 6653

A senator cannot make a speech when he is withdrawing a remark, 545, or asking leave to amend a motion, 4099

On a motion to adjourn, a Minister may answer a question without being taken to have exercised his right of reply, 1167; but a senator who has asked a question and resumed his seat is not entitled to speak again, 6973

When a senator has discussed the main question prior to an amendment being moved, he can only speak to the amendment, 1289-90, 3801, 6302-3

By leave a senator may continue his remarks on another day, 3212

A senator who has moved a motion without remark is taken to have spoken, and cannot speak again except in reply, 4099

Strictly speaking, a debate is concluded with the reply of the mover of the motion; but in a case where he was understood to be merely answering a question, a senator will not be prevented from speaking, 5148

The Minister in charge of a Bill ought not to make a speech after the debate on its first reading has been adjourned, even to explain the course he proposes to take, 5274

A senator who has spoken to the general question, and moved an amendment, cannot move another amendment, but he can speak to another amendment if moved, 6044

A senator who speaks while an amendment is pending is taken to be speaking to the amendment and the main question, 6044

Although a motion is to be put paragraph by paragraph, there can be only one debate on its paragraphs, 6044

A senator who formally dissents from a ruling cannot afterwards speak to the question, except in reply, 6379

A dissent from a ruling by the Chairman of Committees may be discussed by senators before the Chair gives a decision, 6538

The report of a Sessional Committee cannot be discussed on the day on which it is presented, 7344

A senator should not speak to a motion unless he intends to move it, 7455

Rulings.—An objection to a ruling has to be made at once and in writing, and considered at a subsequent sitting, 3347, 4204, 6259

A ruling which, on appeal, has been accepted by the Senate should not be questioned, 4201

Same Question.—The rule is that the same matter shall not be discussed twice in a session; but the discussion of a question on a motion for adjournment ought not to prevent the same matter from being debated again on a notice of motion, 1494

The rule as to the same question does not prevent a senator from submitting a motion for adjournment under the 60th standing order, 7054-8

Select Committees.—It is improper for a member of a Select Committee to inform the press of what has been done until it has reported, 1153

Whether the Printing Committee is to be called together or not, is a matter for the consideration of its members, and not for the leader of the Senate, 2147

If the evidence taken in the previous session "on the subject of the tobacco industry" be referred to the Select Committee on the Tobacco Monopoly "with leave to report it," the Select Committee will not be empowered to comment on such evidence or report concerning its value or otherwise, but simply to append it to the report, 2248

Standing Orders.—A motion for suspending the rules can be moved without notice, but it must be carried by an absolute majority, 1161-6

It is not proper for the Chair to express an opinion as to the Standing Orders of the House of Representatives, 2145, 6542

Where leave has been refused to a senator to move a motion, another senator is not entitled to move the suspension of the Standing Orders for the purpose of submitting a motion on the subject, 6384-6

A suspension of the Standing Orders to enable a Bill to pass through its remaining stages operates until the final stage is passed, 7357

See BAKER, Sir Richard (Speeches).

President, Deputy.

Adjournment of Debate, when moved, must be put without discussion, 1736, 7458

Amendments.—The practice is for one amendment to be disposed of before another can be moved, 1765

Debate.—The remarks of a senator must be relevant to the question, 1760-2

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order—to accuse any senators of wasting time, 1760 If an expression be taken exception to, it should be withdrawn, 5268

Motions.—At the request of a senator a complicated question is divided, 1738, and it is not necessary to move the omission of a paragraph, 1758

Orders of the Day lapse at the close of the session, 7458

Right of Speech.—After the mover of a motion has declined to reply, and the first part of a complicated question has been put, there can be no further debate, 1765

RULINGS—President, Deputy—continued.

Select Committees.—The senators to serve on a Select Committee have to be nominated by the mover, but, on the demand of any senator, they have to be selected by ballot, 1766

See HIGGS, Senator (Speeches).

Chairman of Committees.

Anticipating Discussion.—A senator cannot anticipate the discussion on a motion, 3473, 5920, or on an item in the Appropriation Bill, 5815

Bills.—It is quite regular to take, in their order, clauses as printed and proposed new clauses, 1392-9

In the same Committee no clause or amendment can be proposed substantially the same as one negatived, 1398

An amended clause cannot be postponed, 2666
An amendment which has been withdrawn can be moved in the same Committee, 3542

When it is the wish of the Committee, the Chair will submit in paragraphs a clause, 3554, or an amendment of the other House, 7334

The amendment of Senator O'Keefe to amend section 150 of the Electoral Act is not outside the scope of the Electoral Bill, 4028.
But, according to the decision of the Senate, the Committee cannot entertain the amendment of Senator Millen to insert a new clause, providing for three commissioners to divide each State, 4133, or to amend clause 12 so as to empower the Governor-General to proclaim their scheme, 4197

It is irregular to postpone a portion of an amendment, 4144

Every clause of a Bill has to be put in Committee: it cannot be objected to on the ground of irrelevance, 4994

An amendment to the Commerce Bill must be relevant to its subject-matter, 5004

The amendments of the House of Representatives, proposed in substitution for the union label clauses inserted by the Senate in the Trade Marks Bill, and dealing with the same matter, are permissible under standing order 194, and, therefore, in order, 6537

A refusal to insert an amendment after a certain word in question will prevent a senator from moving to omit that word, 6565

An amendment which is relevant to an amendment of the other House is in order, 7336

Debate.—The discussion must be relevant to the question, 1395, 2926, 4584, 4921, 4926-29, 5026, 5675, 5755, 5830, 6533

A senator cannot discuss the whole Bill on a proposal to insert a new clause, 1395, or on a clause, 4990

A motion to report progress is not debatable, 1651, 2250; and if debated, it must be on the understanding that it does not establish a precedent, 1651

A senator should not repeat an observation several times, 4593-4, and should be heard in silence, 4926, 5023-7

The rule of relevancy is relaxed where it is desired to elicit a statement from a Minister as to the course of business, 4930; but a general discussion on his statement is not permitted, 4933

A senator is enabled to reply to an argument used in debate on a question, 6785

Divisions.—Pairs are not recognised, 7329

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order to attribute to a senator untruth, 1396 to accuse a senator of wasting time, 4922; or of wasting public money and time, 4927; or of a wish to apply the "gag," 4929 to characterize a discussion as a disgraceful waste of public money and time, 4926 to reflect upon a vote of the Senate, 4970

A remark which is regarded as offensive by a senator should be withdrawn, 7240

Points of Order.—It is not the duty of the Chair to offer an opinion on a point of order relative to the interpretation of the Constitution or of a law, 6533

Rulings.—A reflection upon the Chair ought not to be embodied in a written disagreement from a ruling, 6537

Quotations and References.—It is not in order to allude to a debate of current session in the other House, 4920

Suspension of Sitting.—It is competent for the Chair to suspend the sitting of the Committee, 5963

See HIGGS, Senator (Speeches)

House of Representatives:

Speaker, Mr.

Amendments.—No amendment can be proposed to delete any word which has been already ordered to stand part of the question, 811

The mover of a motion having spoken cannot propose an amendment, 816

An amendment in the form of a direct negative to a motion cannot be accepted, 1917, nor can an amendment which is merely an expanded negative, 2968

It is not competent for a member to move an amendment to his own motion, 2833, 3410, 3813

When a debate has been closed, no amendments beyond those previously notified can be moved, 3813-6

Amendments of which notice has been given, but which cannot be proposed owing to previous amendments being before the Chair, can be put after the close of debate, and the previous amendment has been disposed of, 3817

A proposal to limit the operation of a new standing order is admissible as an amendment upon an amendment designed to defer the operation of the standing order to the business of a future session, 5351

It is not competent to move an amendment on an amendment of an amendment, 5379

No amendment can be accepted which would restrict the operation of a provision already agreed to, 5383

On a motion for the third reading of a Bill a direct negative cannot be accepted as an amendment; but a member can move that the Bill be read that day six months, 7135

Ballot.—When six members concur in a request for a ballot, it must be taken if the motion for the appointment of the Select Committee be carried, 4169

Bills.—One Bill may be substituted for another laid on the table by mistake, but only with the absolute concurrence of the House, 358

A Bill appropriating public funds cannot be introduced until the subject-matter has been recommended by resolution in Committee of the whole House, 668

The House may recommit a Bill for as much, or as little, alteration as it pleases, and the motion must specify the extent of the recommitment desired, 2832; the clauses can be re-committed in any order that may be desired, 2836

If a Bill were introduced to amend a specific item in the Tariff, it would be in order to move amendments relating to other items, 4392

Bills, even though of a formal character, cannot be introduced without the usual leave, 7087

Chairman of Committees: Standing Order 215 imposes upon the House the obligation each session to elect a Chairman, 159

The House having resolved that in the event of more than two nominations being made for the position of Chairman of Committees, the election shall be by open exhaustive ballot, then if three candidates are nominated, the balloting must proceed without debate; but if only two candidates are proposed and seconded, debate may take place on the whole question, 472-3

Conduct, Disorderly.—It is distinctly contrary to the Standing Orders for members to stand about the gangways and passages of the Chamber, 86

It is disorderly for members to converse to such an extent as to interfere with a speaker, 1534, 4670, 4862, 6569, 7246, 7288, 7301

It is disorderly for a member to qualify his withdrawal of an offensive remark, or to repeat the remark, 5408

Conduct, Orderly.—Members are entitled to make such reasonable use of the benches in the House as they may find it convenient to do, even to the extent of bringing in bed clothes and reclining at full length, 5341

Debate.—In a debate on the Address-in-Reply, members may refer to a matter of public notoriety, but must not anticipate debate on a motion for the production of papers relating to it, 35, 36

Members must be referred to by the names of the electorates they represent, 246, 7164

Frequent repetitions of arguments are out of order, 246

A member who, having spoken upon a question of privilege, resumes his seat, cannot afterwards move a motion relating to it, 354

In a debate on a Ministerial Statement, a member is in order in discussing the policy of his party, but not at inordinate length, 371

Members speaking must not directly address other members, 374, 594, 596

No comments should be made upon a remark which has been withdrawn, 475

A member may, in order to elicit information from a speaker, interject if not at too great length, 653; but formal questions cannot be put, 656

The discussion must be relevant to the question, 658, 1033, 1913, 1916, 2220, 2407, 2838, 2846, 3144, 3149, 3150, 4521, 4523, 4730, 4863, 4874, 4887, 5329, 5336, 5377, 5395, 5397, 5423, 5488, 5696, 6483, 6499, 6712-9, 7134, 7138, 7164

In debating a motion for the second reading of a Bill, members may refer to cognate subjects, such as the existence of special machinery under State laws, which might suffice without the proposed Commonwealth law, 724; it is not strictly in order to discuss other Bills on the business-paper, but some latitude may be allowed where measures are closely related, 4952

It is not competent for a member, in the course of a second-reading speech, to discuss a question of practice raised but for the time dropped by a preceding speaker, 778

In speaking upon Supply motions (formal), members are precluded from referring to debates upon Bills before the House, 1146

Members have the right to make their own speeches, without having the course of their remarks diverted by constant interjections, 1135, 7168

Members must not anticipate discussion on the subject of a notice of motion, or a measure on the notice-paper, 1441, 1457, 3856, 4743, 4779, 5502, 7085; but incidental allusions may be made, 1444, 5508, 7137

Incidental references only may be made to matters not directly bearing on the subject of debate, 1449

It is not in order to discuss any proceedings of a Committee until it has reported, 1914

The merits of a proposed new standing order under consideration by the Standing Orders Committee can be discussed only after the Committee reports, 1914-20

A member cannot move the adjournment of a debate after having spoken to a motion, 1918

It is not in order to refer to a previous debate which has been closed, 1920, 1921, 5509, 6720, 7437, or to debates in the Senate, 7160

It is not in order to refer to a Bill before the Senate, 3058, 4743, 4887

Members may, upon an amendment being proposed, again speak to a motion, but only to the extent to which the question is re-opened by the amendment, 3225

It is not in order to read extracts from newspapers referring to debates during the same session, 3408, 5697, 6328

It is customary to recognise the right of Ministers to deal with each other's business at any stage, 3568

It is not competent, upon the motion for the adoption of the report from the Committee of Supply, to discuss matters not dealt with in the Estimates, nor the general policy of the Government, 4605, 4608, 4611; nor upon the second reading of the Appropriation Bill, 4764

It is not competent for a member, when debating a motion "That the Chairman do leave the chair," to discuss the details of the Bill before the Committee, except he can base upon any particular clause a reason why the Chairman should leave the chair, 5093

In debating a motion for the adoption of a proposed new standing order, it is not in order for a member to discuss the merits of a Bill in regard to which it may operate; but reference may be made by way of illustration, 5293, 5306

Upon a motion for the adjournment of a debate—as distinguished from a motion for the adjournment of the House—it is not competent to argue that members are so tired out that they cannot give proper consideration to the business; nor is it in order to refer, except incidentally, to the lateness of the hour, or the extent to which the Speaker might be affected, 5340; mention only may be made of measures of urgency which a member considers should have precedence, 5345

Members are entitled to speak without being corrected by interjectors, 5294.

Whilst there is no time limit to speeches on a motion for adjournment of a debate, members must not occupy more than a reasonable time, 5341, 5342

Standing order 276, which makes provision against continued irrelevance, tedious repetition, and speeches of such unwarrantable length as to obstruct business, must be observed, 5343, 5348

It is not in order for a member to repeat arguments used by others or by himself in the same way during the same debate, 5366, 5376, 5431

A member cannot discuss the whole of the measures that might be introduced under the powers conferred by section 51 of the Constitution in debating a question affecting the business which may come before Parliament in a given session, 5383

When an amendment is moved offering an alternative to the original proposal, it is open for members to refer to either alternative, but when the amendment has been amended, and a further amendment of the amendment is submitted, the discussion must be confined to the last proposal. The main question can be discussed only when the amendments have been disposed of, 5400, 5401, 5402, 5405, 5409.

Before the Standing Order of the House of Commons empowering the Speaker to forthwith put the question upon a dilatory motion can be applied, it must be shown that the rules of the House are being abused, 5410

The adjournment of the House cannot be discussed upon a motion for the adjournment of a debate, 5412; nor is reference permitted to previous debate; or to the mental condition of members, 5415

The Speaker's personal views or physical condition have nothing to do with the discussion upon a motion for adjournment of a debate, 5416

The Speaker is justified in suspending a sitting of the House for such time as may be necessary for securing the purpose in view, 5425

Whilst it is competent on the third reading of the Appropriation Bill to refer to errors of administration on the part of the Government, members cannot discuss at length the conduct of a manufacturer who is not a member, 4881; or seek the redress of grievance 4889; or discuss any matter beyond the purview of the Bill, 4895.

A member cannot be permitted to comment any more than condemn, the action of the Chair, 5477

When an amendment has been withdrawn, has no longer any bearing upon the debate, 5515

There is no reason why a member should reply to interjections, 5697-8

When debating new standing orders, relative to the application of the closure, members must confine their remarks to the special forms of closure, proposed either in the original motion, or by way of amendment 5701-02, 5713; and must avoid duplication of debate upon allied proposals which have been disposed of, 5763, 5773

A member must accept the assurance of another member, 4763, 5594, 5762

When debating a Bill dealing with the introduction of contract immigrants, it is not competent for members to discuss, except incidentally, the larger question of the desirability of general immigration, 6428, 6431

The debate on the second reading of a Bill should be addressed to its principles and not to details of clauses, 6575

A question cannot be raised a second time, 6711

It is not competent for a member, after having been defeated on a proposal for the amendment of a certain clause in a Bill, to move a further amendment, 7114

A member may debate a question when it has been put from the Chair, 7114

Interjections and Interruptions.—Are disorderly, 33, 34, 128, 131, 320, 548, 628, 1041, 1135, 1446, 2385, 2395, 2396, 2846, 3143, 3492, 3606, 4045, 4047, 4741, 4955, 5280, 5295, 5494

The fact that interjections are invited by the speaker does not justify them, 2986

Even provocative interjections do not justify loud conversations across the Chamber, 548

Members who continue to interject in defiance of instructions from the Chair are committing the additional offence of disobedience, 7010

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order to say that a member's statement is untrue, 69, 85, 1486, 1714, 2846, 2847, 3219, 4047, 4750, 5590, 5762 to say that a member is making a deliberate mis-statement, 1446 to say that a statement is false, 1714 to quote from a newspaper article remarks which, if uttered by a member directly, would be out of order, 243, 244, 349, 560 to describe a member as a "vile slanderer," 324 to impute improper motives, 385, 1135 to describe a member as "groggy," 475 to ask Mr. Speaker to restrain his impatience, 596

RULINGS—Speaker, Mr.—continued.

Language, Unparliamentary (continued).—It is not in order to accuse members of organized stone-walling, 729; of availing themselves of the forms of the House to obstruct business, 785; of acting maliciously, 786; of hum-bugging the House, 1045; of deliberately wasting time, 4627, 4868; of adopting an asinine attitude towards everything, 4631; of having sold their State, 4767; of making drunken interjections, 5348 to say that a member has made a "contemptible and dirty" insinuation, 1459; or is talking "twaddle," 1916

to say that the Government is living by "false pretences and deceit," but a member may accuse them of political false pretences, 1540 to tell a member to "hold his tongue," 1911 to say that a Minister is adopting a "mean and paltry way of escaping from his responsibility," 2620

to tell a member to "behave himself," 2621 to charge the Government with attempting to "bulldoze" a Bill through the House, 2840 to charge members with "concocting schemes in the lobbies and secret places," 2877

to charge the Government with brutality, 3990, 6568

to say that a member is prepared to sacrifice any principle for payment, 4158 to make reflections on the House, 4604

to call a member a "cad," 4621 to say that a member is "paid to make interjections," 4627

to refuse to accept a member's denial, 4763 to say that a member would put certain powers to unworthy use, 5293 to imply that a member has accepted bribes, 5349 to say that members are "up for the highest bidder," 5408

to describe a member's conduct as "political cocktailism," 5717

to say that members have been sold, and are being sold again, 5719

to say that a Minister is "the tool of the Labour caucus," 5763 to say that a member is doing the work of "his masters" in reference to others than his constituents, 6337

to give the lie direct to a member or insinuate that he does not speak the truth, 6710 to say that a member is "quibbling, as he always does," 6711

Language, Parliamentary.—The use of the expression, "This is not business," as implying that time is being wasted, is not necessarily objectionable, 279

A member is in order in expressing his opinion that questions without notice are becoming "inordinately multiplied," 1565

In replying to a charge of scandalous neglect of duty by absenting himself from the Chamber, a member may charge other members with "deliberate obstruction," 1714, 1715

Motions.—A motion is not out of order even though an identical motion may have been agreed to in the previous session, 1458

RULINGS—Speaker, Mr.—continued.

A motion to discharge members from attendance on a Select Committee from which they have resigned may be moved by any member, 5522

Papers.—All papers go automatically to the Printing Committee, unless the member presenting them moves that they be printed, 629, 4511

Personal Explanation.—If a member, in making a personal explanation, raises a question of privilege, debate may ensue, 658

A member is not entitled in the course of a personal explanation, to comment on the conduct or statements of other members, 786, 3276, 3888, 5428

A personal explanation cannot be made during the speech of another member, 1486, 1552, 5301

A personal explanation cannot be discussed,
4621

A member cannot make a personal explanation for another member, 5426, 5428

Petitions relating to measures not before the House cannot be received, 4043

Privilege—Breach of.—A member accusing a newspaper of breach of privilege, must conclude with a motion declaring that the printer or publisher has been guilty of contempt, 649

Questions.—Questions containing argument cannot be put, and Ministers, in replying, are not permitted to indulge in argument, 1435, 4740; nor when asking a question is it permissible under standing order 91 to read a newspaper article, 4740

Questions cannot be addressed to a private member except on business on the paper in his name, 4740, 5760

Questions cannot be asked with reference to measures before the Senate, 5276

Even at question time a member has not right to demand an answer from a Minister, 6826

Quorum.—It is not in order for a member to repeatedly direct attention to the state of the House when a quorum is present, 1478

Rulings.—Must not be discussed except on specific motion for disagreement, 372

Mr. Speaker cannot be expected to give his ruling upon questions as to the powers of Parliament under an Act, 855

Senate.—Measures before that House must not be referred to, 3058, 4743, 4887

Speaker.—Extremely undesirable, especially in controversial matters, to refer in debate to occupant of Chair, 5423

Standing Orders.—The suspension of the Standing Orders to enable the House to obtain Supply suspends such standing orders as would prevent the appointment of a Chairman or an Acting Chairman of Committees, 157, 160

A question relating to action which might be taken by the Senate in regard to lapsed
Bills, cannot be referred to the Standing Orders Committee of the House of Representatives, but references to a joint meeting of the Committees of both Houses is permissible, 355, 357

RULINGS—Speaker, Mr.—continued.

Suspension of the Standing Orders cannot be obtained without notice, except by unanimous leave, and by vote of an absolute majority, 471

A motion for suspension of the Standing Orders having been agreed to, the question of suspension cannot be further discussed, 1380

The Standing Orders Committee are empowered to consider any matter referred to them by the House, or that they may think fit, 5168

It is not necessary to refer proposed new Standing Order to a Committee of the whole House, 5514

Strangers' Seats.—A member occupying a space railed off for strangers is regarded as being outside the chamber, 3148

See HOLDER, Sir F. (Speeches).

Speaker, Mr. Deputy.

Conduct, Orderly.—It is not disorderly for members to lounge upon the benches, or even to go to sleep under certain circumstances, 5351; but they are not justified in doing so in such a fashion as to cause offence to others, 5375

Debate.—The discussion must be relevant to the question, 5351, 5353, 5355.

Members must not read newspaper references to a pending debate, 5368; or repeat arguments used by others during the same debate, 5369, 5389

Deputy Speaker.—When the Chairman is acting as Deputy Speaker, he should be addressed as "Mr. Speaker," 2415

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order for a member to say that the Deputy Speaker has made an improper remark, 5352; or has failed to give fair play, 5373 to reflect upon Ministers, 5367 to accuse members of deliberately wasting time, 6592

Quorum.—When attention is called to the state of the House, the Deputy Speaker need not count the House if he is satisfied that a quorum is present, 5112

Rulings must not be discussed, 5369, 5379

See SALMON, Mr. C. C. (Speeches).

Chairman of Committees.

Amendments.—It is not competent, when an amendment is before the Chairman, to move another amendment, 2462, 3082

An amendment going beyond the scope of a Bill as indicated by the title may be accepted prior to the consideration and adoption of the title, 2533

It is not competent to submit an amendment inconsistent with a provision already agreed to in a Bill, 7106

A Bill dealing solely with electoral matters cannot be amended by the insertion of a clause relating to the actions of members of Parliament, 7119, 7124, except where it has been recommitted for that purpose, 7124

Bills.—At the report stage it is competent to move for the recommitment of certain clauses, and that certain new clauses be considered, 2707

A clause, having been amended, cannot be postponed, 2695

RULINGS—Chairman of Committees—continued.

Amendments to a proposed new clause cannot be moved before it has been read a second time, 3937

The first and second readings of new clauses must take place in Committee, 3938

Where proceedings on a Bill are resumed at the stage at which they were interrupted by the prorogation it is not necessary to retrace steps which may have been taken in regard to it, to the extent, for example, of partly dealing with a portion of message received from the Senate, 3977

It is not competent to postpone a clause until the following day, 6505, or to move the omission of a clause, 6744

It is not competent to increase the amount of bounty proposed to be paid in a Bill providing for that form of assistance to sugar-growers, 6889

Until the clauses of the Bill have been dealt with, new clauses cannot be proposed or discussed, 6744, 6886

Where by general consent it was agreed to take a test vote on the question, the decision should be recognised, 6766

A member is not entitled to move a new clause which is at variance with a decision of the Committee, 7098

The destination of a grant cannot be disturbed, 7432

Conduct, Disorderly.—It is disorderly to interrupt the Chairman, 4664

Interjections and Interruptions are disorderly, 1210, 1369, 1822, 1837, 1839, 2112, 2705, 3848, 5207, 6131

It is not necessary for a member to reply to interjections, 1595

Even a pertinent question may be regarded as an interruption, and therefore disorderly, 2635

Debate.—The discussion must be relevant to the question, 1369, 2555, 2632, 3853, 3902, 3980, 4435, 4557, 5861, 6139, 6504, 6506, 6766, 6880-5, 7111

Tedious repetitions are out of order, 1370, 4434, 5198

It is in order for a member to read from Hansard for the current session, 1603

It is not in order for a member to read his speech, 1624

In discussing the Budget, a member must not refer to the details of a Bill on the business paper, 1709; or anticipate debate upon the subject of a notice of motion, 1833, 2028

An honorable member must not turn his back to the Chair, 1822

The proceedings of a Select Committee ought not to be discussed by a member until it has reported, 1834

In debating the Estimates for Additions, New Works, and Buildings, a member must not anticipate discussion on the Estimates-in-chief, 2030, 2035

In debating a Bill in Committee, members must confine their remarks to the clause before the Chair, 2452, 2522, 5065, 5067, 5070; and must refrain from discussing amendments not before the Committee, 5194. Some latitude may, however, be permitted in the case of a Minister replying to a general attack upon the principles of a Bill, 2692

RULINGS—Chairman of Committees—continued.

On a motion preliminary to the introduction of a Supply Bill, it is not competent for members to discuss matters which are not before the Committee or the House, 2717, 2749, 2750, 2752, 2756

Members must not refer to speeches delivered in the Senate, 2746; or to a measure before that House, 5052

A member who is ruled out of order, and who defies the Chair, is no longer in possession of the Chair, 3096

A proposed vote on the Estimates cannot be postponed after discussion, except by leave, 3327

In discussing the Estimates, it is not in order for a member to refer to a matter which occurred in the House, and has not been referred to the Committee, 3573 to refer to matters regarding which no item appears on the Estimates, 3628, 4073, 4435 to reflect upon any vote or decision of the House, 3628 to make more than incidental reference to items other than those before the Chair, 3914, 4085, 4087, 4088, 4185

to discuss the relations of the Government to other parties in the House, 4082 to discuss in detail questions of Ministerial policy, 3841

The discussion should be confined to matters of administration in the Department under consideration, 3842, 4059, 4061

A member rising to a point of order cannot discuss the statements of another honorable member before first stating his point, 3573

In the interests of public business, the Chairman is justified in allowing special latitude to the Minister in charge of a Bill, and the leader of the Opposition, when they are endeavouring to arrange for facilitating the passing of a Bill, but if the negotiations fail the discussion must cease, 5079

On a motion, "That the Chairman leave the Chair," a member cannot discuss the details of the Bill before the Committee, 5105

On a motion for the omission of certain words in a clause, members are not justified in discussing in detail a projected amendment to fill the blank proposed to be created, 5197

In moving an amendment, a member is not in order in anticipating others, 5857

Strictly the discussion should be relevant to the question; but where an unusual degree of latitude has been allowed to the Prime Minister, it will be allowed to all other members who did not discuss the second reading of the Bill, 7042

Divisions.—A member must vote in accordance with his voice, 3978

Language, Parliamentary.—It is in order for a member to characterize a statement contained in a letter quoted in debate as a "lie," 6140

RULINGS—Chairman of Committees—continued.

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order—to infer that a member dare not vote in accordance with his conscience, 1378 to say that a member's insinuations are "cowardly," 1594 to say that a member "considers it necessary to waste time," 1619 to reflect upon the action of Parliament, 1702, 4553; or upon a member, 4434 to infer that some members are "the most ignorant men alive," 1707

to state that a member is lying, 1837, 6710

to call a member a cad, 1837

to say that no one knows better than a member that a statement he has made is "absolutely incorrect," 1839, or "absolutely contrary to fact," 3524 to call members "Thugs," 1841 to speak of members as "these people," 2755, or as concocting schemes in the lobbies and secret places, 2877

to say that a member is uttering a "deliberate falsehood," 3523 to say that a member's conduct is a "public scandal," 3579 to say that certain members are a "servile crowd," 3847 to accuse members of "assisting to defraud the revenue," 3848; or of having entered into a "conspiracy of silence," 5210 to imply that a member is a man of no reputation, 3848

to refer to certain members as "labour barrackers," 3850 to accuse members of "conniving at an act of injustice," 3851 to say that members pay no attention to anything that comes before the House, 5056; or that they are wasting time, 5065;

or attempting to stifle discussion, 5066 to describe members as "barrackers," 4082 to say that a member's statement is "absolutely untrue," 3524; or as "not true," 4428 to say that members had entered into a conspiracy, 6132

to say that a member's remarks are "tommy rot," 6141 to say that members are "putting up jobs," 6240; or wish to pass legislation of the most heinous and damnable description, 6241 to say that a member is a "disgrace to the Chamber," 6241 to say that the Government are making a "degrading display of brute force," 6502; or are "heaping degradation on their heads," 6504 to say that a member is trying to bluff the Committee, 6507 to say that a member is a coward, 6710

to reflect on Parliament, 6764

Motions.—It is not necessary to obtain leave to withdraw a motion which has not been put from the Chair, 2055

Personal Explanation.—A personal explanation cannot be interposed whilst another member is in possession of the Chair, 4429

Rulings.—It is not within the province of the Chairman to give an opinion on a point of constitutional law, 2645

The Chairman's ruling must not be questioned, except by the procedure laid down in the Standing Orders, 3978, 6040

Standing Orders.—The Standing Orders are not suspended merely by the moving of a motion "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair," 1833

See SALMON, Mr. C. C. (Speeches)

Chairman, Temporary.

Amendments which have not been put do not require to be withdrawn, 3983

Conduct, Orderly.—A Minister may sit where he likes, but must speak from the Ministerial bench or at the table, 3985

Debate.—In discussing the Estimates, members must confine themselves to the question before the Chair, 3724, 3731, 3733, 3736, 3738, 3741, 3742, 3822; must not anticipate debate upon a Bill before the House, 3732; or a motion on the business paper, 3739, 3740, 3749; or extend the discussion into a debate on the general policy of the Government, 3734

On a motion "That the Chairman leave the Chair," a member cannot discuss in detail the Bill before the Committee, 5110

In discussing a Bill in Committee, members must confine their remarks to the amendment before the Chair, 5189

It is not imperative for a member to lay on the table private letters or memoranda quoted by him, but all public documents quoted by a Minister must be laid on the table, 6135

It is not in order to read newspaper extracts relating to debates in the House, 6154

Language, Unparliamentary.—A member must not reflect on the Chair, 3731, 3740, or the Deputy Speaker, 5112; or say that a member's statement is not true, 3984; or that a member is speaking as if he had been to a public-house, 3684; or accuse another of telling lies, 3984

Rulings.—A member cannot discuss the Chairman's ruling unless he moves that it be dissented from, 5108

See BATCHELOR, Mr. E. L. (Speeches).

Language, Unparliamentary.—A member must not use the word "stone-walling," 3746

See WILKS, Mr. W. H. (Speeches).

Debate.—In debating a motion "That the Chairman do leave the Chair," a member is not in order in discussing the details of the Bill before the Committee, 5095

A member is not in order in repeating a statement again and again, 5096

In discussing a Bill in Committee, members must confine their remarks to the amendment before the Chair, 5190

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order for a member to describe members as "washed out" or incapable, 5096

to describe a member as "the greatest blowhard in the Chamber," 6161; as a "boddler's messenger boy," 6161

See MAUGER, Mr. S. (Speeches)

RULINGS.—Chairman, Temporary—continued.

Language, Unparliamentary.—Is it not in order to say that a member is "unfair and knows it," 6181

See McDONALD, Mr. C. (Speeches)
